(a) Phasicaus colchious, the bird originally called phecasant from its supposed origin, of which nothing is certainly known, and now for many centuries naturalised in Great Britain and in other parts of Europe. The cock bird in full plumage is nearly three feet long, of which length the tail is more than half. The head and neck are deep steel-blue, glancing greenish in some lights; and there is a bare red skin about the eyes. The general color is golden-brown, varying to chestnut or plain brown, on most parts intimately barred or laced with black. The hen is more yellowish-brown, and only about two thirds as long. This pheasant runs into some varieties in domestication, and also crosses freely with several related species. The several other forms of the restricted genus are definitely known as to their origin and habitat, all being natives of China and Tibet and more southerly regions of Asia, as well as of Japan and many other islands included in the Oriental fauns. Several of these ore often seen in aviaries and in somi-domestication. They are such as Shaw's P. Sasce', the Mongolian, P. songolicus; the Yarkand, P. tongatus; the Frencescal P. torquatus; the Chinese ringless, P. desollatus; the Japanese green, P. servicolor and the groundbacked golden, P. despans; also pheasants known as Reoves's, Wallich's, Summering's, Swinhoe's, Elliot's, etc. Pheasants have often been introduced in the United States, where, however, none have been thoroughly naturalised, unless the cases of P. servicolor and P. summering in Oregon should prove successful. (b) Hones, any bird of the sulfamily Phasicandes or (with a few exceptions) of the family Phasicandes. (c) In the United States, the ruffed groune, linears unbelde: so called in the Southern and Middle States wherever the bobwhite (Ortizativisiana) is known as the partridge, and called partridge, in the Northern States wherever the bobwhite is known as the quad. See cut under Bonasa. (d) Loosely, one of various birds which resemble or suggest a pheasant sepecially in the length of the tail: usually with a qualifying word: (1) The reed-pheasant, or bearded tilmouse, Pesseuse blarminus. (Norfolk, Eng.] (2) The mapple. (Ornwall, Eng.] (3) A morganus; any one of the three species found in the United States: more fully called pheasant-duch; see pheasant, several different American guans (Cracides). (4) The Australian malloc-bird. See Lespec. (6) A duck, Dafta cauta: more fully called pheasant-duch cover-pheasant, Hocal, U. Providence!

South, Sermons, IV. IX.

The term appearance is used to denote not only that which reveals itself to our observation, as existent, but also to signify that which only seems to be, in contrast to that which truly is. There is thus not merely a certain regueness in the word, but it even involves a kind of contradiction to the sense in which it is used when employed for phenomenon. In consequence of this, the term phenomenon has been naturalized in our language as a philosophical substitute for the term appearance.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., viii.

A phenomenon, as commonly understood, is what is manifest, sonsible, evident, the implication being that there are eyes to see, ears to hear, and so forth. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 38.

And do we need any more evidence to convince us that phenomena—by which I mean the effects produced upon our consciousness by unknown external agencies—are all that we can compare and classify, and are therefore all that we can know?

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), III. i.

Syn. Philanthropy, Cherity. Originally these words were the same, meaning the love of fellow-man, a sense which philanthropy retains, but charity (except in Biblical language: see i Cor. xiii., authorised version) has lost. Each expresses both spirit and action; but philanthropy cannot be applied to a concrete act, wille charity may; hence we speak of a charity, but not of a philanthropy; on the other hand, as a spirit, philanthropy looks upon human welfare as a thing to be promoted, especially by preventing or mitigating actual suffering, while charity, outside of Biblical usage, is simply disposed to take as favorable a view as possible of the character, conduct, motives, or the like, of a fellow-man. As activity, charity helps men individually; philanthropy helps the individual as a member of the race, or provides for large numbers. Philanthropy agitates for prison-reform and the prevision of occupation for released convicts; charity gives a released convict such personal help as he needs.

Philology . . . deals with human speech, and with all that speech discloses as to the nature and history of man. Waltasy, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 768.

Comparative philology, the study of languages as carried on by the comparative method; investigation, by means of a comparison of languages, of their history, relationships, and characteristics, within marrower or wider limits; linguistic science; linguistics; glossology.

inits; linguistic science; linguistics; glossology.

Philology, whether clausical or oriental, whether treating of snoient or modern, of entitivated or harharous languages, is an historical science. Language is here treated simply as a means. The classical scholar uses Greek or Latin, the oriental scholar Hebrew or Sanskrit, or any other language, as a key to an understanding of the literary monuments which bygone ages have bequeathed to us, as a spell to raise from the tomb of time the thoughts of great men in different ages and different countries, and as a means ultimately to trace the social, moral, intellectual, and religious progress of the human race. . . . In comparative shidology the case is totally different. In the acience of language, languages are not treated as a means; language itself becomes the sole object of scientific inquiry. Dialects which have never produced any literature at all, the jargons of savage tribes, the clicks of the Hottentots, and the vocal modulations of the Indo-Chinese, are as important, nay, for the solution of some of our problems, more important, than the poetry of Homer or the prose of Cicero. We do not want to know languages, we want to know language; what language is, how it can form a vehicle or an organ of thought; we want to know language that we collect, arrange, and classify all the facts of language that are within our reach.

The body of highest truth; the organized sum of science; the science of which all others are branches; the science of the most fundamental matters. This science of the most fundamental matters. This is identified by different schools—(a) with the account of the elementary factors operative in the universe; the science of principles, or the matter, form, causes, and ends of things in general; (b) with the science of the absolute; metaphysics: (a) with the science of science; the theory of condition; logic. In Greek, philosophy originally signified curre; but from Aristotle down it had two meanings—(a) speculative knowledge, and (b) the study of the highest things, metaphysics. Chrysippus defined it as the science of things divine and human. In the middle ages philosophy was understood to embrace all the speculative sciences: hence the faculty and degree of arts in German universities are called the faculty and degree in philosophy.

In philosophy, the contemplations of men do either pone-trate unto God or are circumferred to nature, or are re-flected or reverted upon himself. Out of which several inquiries there do arise three knowledges, divine philoso-phy, natural philosophy, and human philosophy, or human-ity.

1. A genus of ornamental gamopetalous plants of the order Polemoniaceur, characterized by a deeply three-valved loculicidal capsulo, included stamens unequally inserted on the tube of a salver-shaped corolla, and entire leaves. The Proceeds are natives of North inserted on the tube of a salver-shaped corolla, and entire leaves. The 30 species are natives of North America and Siberia. They are erect or spreading herbs, often tall perennials, bearing chiefly opposite leaves, and showy flowers usually in a flat or pyramidal cyme, red, violet, purplish, white, or blue. Most apecies are cultivated under the name phice, P. speciesa as the pride-of-Columbia, P. mboilata as the most-pink. P. maculata is the wild sweet-william of the middle and western United States. P. paniculata, with large pyramidal clusters of flowers, mittee of the central and southern States, is the parent of most of the persunial phloxes of the gardens. The annual varieties in gardens are from P. Driemmondit of Texas, there discovered by Drummond in 1885. P. discrictata is the wild phlox of the castern States, with early bluish-like showers. P. reptsus, the creeping phlox, is an important spring-flowering species of the south.

Doimos.] The inner of the two satellites of the planet Mars, discovered by Assah Hall at Washington, in Auner of the two satellites of the planet Mars, discovered by Asaph Hall at Washington, in August, 1877. This extraordinary body revolves in the plane of the equator of Mars, at a distance of only about 8,700 miles from the surface of the planet, but as it is probably only about five and a half miles in diameter, it would appear only one sixth of the apparent diameter of our moon at the senith, and on the horizon, owing to the enormous parallax, only about one fourteenth of the same. At the equinoxes it is in cellpase about one fifth of the time, or double that proportion of the time between sunset and suurise. At the soluties it does not suffer cellipse. It revolves about tix primary in 7 hours, 89 minutes, and 14 seconds, and as Mars revolves on its axis in 24 hours, 87 minutes, and 22.7 seconds, it follows that the satellite appears to an observer on Mars to rise in the west and set in the cast, its return to his meridian occurring in 11 hours, 6 minutes, and 22 seconds, but, owing to its close proximity, its velocity will appear to be much greater. At a station on the equator of Mars (where the satellite always passes through the senith), it will, ont of its 11 hours and 6 minutes of period, pass only 8 hours and 20 minutes above the horizon against 7 hours and 46 minutes below.

[NL., < Phocs + -4ds.] A family of aquatic carnivorous mammals of the order Ferse and suborder Pinnépedia, having the limbs modified into fins or flipdia, having the limbs modified into fins or flippers; the seals. The family was formerly coextensive with the suborder, including the otaries and the walruses as well as the true seals, and divided into three shfamilies: Arotocophalina, the otaries; Tricheckins, the walruses; and Phocina, the seals proper. The last alone now constitute the family Phocides, having the body truly phociform, with the hinder limbs projecting backward, and not capable of being turned forward; the outer ear obsolete; the fore flippers smaller than the hind ones, and having the digits ancessively shortened and armed with claws, while the hind flippers are emarginated by the shortening of the third and fourth digits, and are usually but not always provided with claws. The incisors are variable in number, and the upper ones are unnotched. The skull has no slippenoid canals, and the postorbital processes are obsolete. In this restricted sense the Phocides are represented by about 12 genera, and divided into the subfamilies Phocins, Opstophorius, and Brignathus.

1. The typical genus of the family Pholadidae and the subfamily Pholadiuse. It was formerly coextensive with the family, but has been variously subdivided. By recent writers it is restricted to species having the dorsal margin protected by two neacessary valvas (see accessary), anterior and posterior, and with umbond processes reflected over the beaks. The species are of some conomical value, the Pholas dactyles, called piddock, being marketable and also used as bat in England.

2. [L. c.] A species of the genus Pholas; a ing marketane and also used as bast in England.

 2. [l. c.] A species of the genus Pholas; a pholad; a piddock. See cut under piddock.
 Pholcids (fol'si-dō), n. pl. [NL. (C. Koch, 1850), < Pholeus + idee.] A family of spiders formerly placed in the superfamily Retitelaria, to the recently put among the more primitive forms, near the Dysderidæ, Hypochilidæ, and Milistatidæ. They are pale, long-legged apiders, living in dark places and having either six or eight eyes. The male palpi are very poculiar. Pholous (fol'kus), n. [NL. (Walckenaer, 1805), ζ Gr. φολεός, squint-cyed.] A genus of spiders, typical of the family Pholeidæ, having the eyes in three groups, a cluster of three on each side typical of the family Photesta, having the eyes in three groups, a cluster of three on each side of the median two. Nine species are known in the United States. They live either in cellars or under rocks in the woods, and construct irrogular webs in which they stand upside down. The webs are violently shaken as a defense. The egg-coccon is carried in the female's mouth. The legs of some species are multiarticulate, indicating a relationality with the Optiones.

pholerite (fol'g-rit), n. [Prop. *pholidita, < Gr. φολίς (φολίο-), scale, + -ite².] A clay-like mineral closely related to or identical with kaolinite. It usually occurs in masses consisting of minute scales.

 phonogram (fö'nῦ-gram), n. [〈Gr. φωή, sound, voice, + γράμμα, a writing, letter: see gram².]
 1. A graphic character representing a sound of the human voice.

It is probable that the adoption of the important step by which the advance was made from ideograms to pho-negrous arose out of the necessity of expressing proper names. Issue Taylor, The Alphabot, J. 22.

2. The record of sound produced by a phonograph, or the sheet of tin-foil or cylinder of wax on which it is produced.

There is a brass cylinder, on which the wax phonogram is placed.

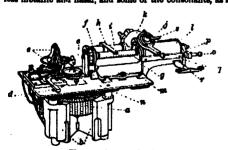

Nature, XXXIX. 108.

phonograph (fō'nō-graf), n. [= F. phono-grapho, (Gr. φωνή, sound, voice, + γράφειν, write.] 1. A type or character for expressing a sound; a character used in phonography.—
2. A form of phonautograph, the invention of Thomas A. Edison, by means of which sounds are made to produce on a register permanent tracings, each having an individual character corresponding to the sound producing it. The sounds can be afterward reproduced from the register. In its original form it consists essentially of a curved tabe, one end of which is fitted with a mouth-plece, while the other end (about two inches in diame-ter) is closed with a diaphragm of exceedingly thin motal.

Phonograph (earlier form).

Connected with the center of this disphragm is a stoci point, which, when the sounds are projected on the disk from the mouthpiece, vibrates backward and forward. This part of the apparatus is adjusted to a cylinder which rotates on a horizontal axis. On the surface of the cylinder is cut a spiral groove, and on the axis there is a spiral screw of the same pitch, which works in a nut. When the instrument is to be used, a piece of thi-foil is gummed round the cylinder, and the steel point is adjusted so as just to touch the tin-foil above the line of the spiral groove. If words are now spoken through the mouthpiece, and the cylinder is kept rotating either by the hand or by clockwork, a series of small marks will be made on the foil by the vibratory movement of the steel point, and these markings will such have an individual character corresponding to the various sounds. The sounds thus registered are reproduced by placing the disphragm with its steel point in the same position with reference to the tin-foil as when the cylinder originally started. When the cylinder is rotated, the indentations previously made cause the stee joint to rise or fall, or otherwise vibrate, as they pass under it, and the disphragm is consequently thrown into a state of ribration exactly corresponding to that which produced the markings, and thus affects the surrounding air so as to produce sounds closely similar to those originally made by the voice. The reproduced sound is, however, more or less metallic and masal, and some of the consonants, as s and a, are not clearly given. The contents of the stripe of foil may be reproduced in sound after any length of fime, and repeated until the markings become effect. The instrument has recently been improved and made in the form shown in the second out, in which the cylinder is driven by an electric current from a battery, and the tinfoil is replaced by a cylinder of hard wax, which can be turned off to remove marks and thus fitted to register other sounds—a process that may be repeated many times before the cylinder is rendered useless.

phonograph (fő'no-gráf), v. t. [< phonograph, n.] To register or record by means of the phonograph.

phonographer (fō-nog'ra-fèr), n. [< phonograph, phonograph-y, +-er¹.] 1. One who is versed in phonography; a writer of phonography, or phonetic shorthand.—2. One who uses or who is skilled in the use of the phonograph.

[= F. phonogra-phie, ⟨ Gr. φωνή, sound, voice, + -γραφία, ⟨ γρά-φεν, write.] 1. The science of sound-signs, or the representation of vocal sounds.—2. The representation of words as they are pronounced; specifically, a system of phonetic writing in shorthand introduced by Isaac Pitman of Bath, shorthand introduced by Isaac Pitman of Bath, England, in the year 1837. The consonants are represented by simple lines (called stems), curved or straight, light or heavy, vertical, horizontal, or slanting, with initial and terminal hooks, circles, loops, etc.; the vowels are represented by dots and dashes, light or heavy, by combinations of them, and by small angles and semicircles. In actual use most of the vowel-signs are omitted (though they may in many cases be approximately indicated by the position—above, on, or below the line—of the consonant-term), and the consonant-stems, by halving, doubling, etc., are made to perform extra duty. To secure further brevity, various arbitrary devices are employed. Mr. Pitman's system has been variously modified and improved by himself and others in England and America. Rec skorthand.

5. The construction and use of phonographs, and the recording of sound by mechanical means, with a view to its reproduction. phonolite (fō'nō-līt), ν. [= F. phonolite = Pg. phonolite; equiv. to clinkstone; ⟨Gr. φωνή, sound, + λίθως, stone.] The name given by Klaproth to certain volcanic rocks of exceedingly variable and complex character, but closely related to the trachytes. The essential constituents of the ble and complex character, but closely related to the trachytes. The essential constituents of phonolite are sanidine and nephelin, and some authors restrict the name to rocks having this composition. Rocks containing sanidine and leucite are called by Rosenbusch leucite-phonolites, varieties of which pass into or are closely allied with leucitophyre and leucite-basalt. Noscan and haityne are often present in rocks of this class, and give names to varieties known as noscan-phonolite and haityne-phonolite. Anthors are by no means agreed in opinion with regard to the classification of the many varieties of nephelin and leucite rocks, which frequently pass into each other by insonable gradations. Boricky makes eight divisions of the phonolite family. With the essential constituents of the various phonolites are associated many accessory minerals, especially magnetice, as well as olivin, spatite, sircon, etc. Various scolitic minerals are of frequent occurrence in the phonolites as alteration products. Phonolite is peculiarly a modern volcanic rock. Auvergne and Bohemia are localities in which it is found in various forms characteristic of volcanic action.

phonometer (fo-nom'e-ter), n. [= F. phonometre = Pg. phonometro, < (ir. $\phonometar$), sound, voice, $\phonometar$ + $\pmu trpov$, measure.] An instrument for experimentally determining and exhibiting the number of vibrations of a sonorous body (as a string or tuning-fork) in a unit of time. The simplest form comprises apparatus for uniformly moving a paper tape coated with fampblack in contact with a delicate tracing-point fixed to the vibrating body. By this means an undulating curve is traced having a length corresponding to the time of its motion. The number of undulations in the curve is also the number of vibrations made by the sounding string or fork. By the substitution of sensitized paper for the blackened tape, and a small mirror for the tracing-point, permanent photographic tracings of such curves can be made. See Savart's wheel (under wheel), and siven, and compare phonomotor (fo-no-mo'(qv), n. [< (ir. $\phov{v}\)], sound, voice, + L. motor, mover: see motor.]

Phormium (for'mi-um), n. [NL. (J. and G. Forster, 1776), ζ (ir. φορμίον, a plant, a kind of sage. Cf. Gr. φορμίον, dim. of φορμός, a basket, mat, ζ φέρειν = Ε. bear¹.] A genus of liliaceous plants of the tribe Henerocallese, characterized by the turbinate form of the perianth above its short tube, with three lanceelate erect sepals and three thinner petals slightly spreading at the apex. The 2 species, with several varieties, are matives of New Zeeland and Norfolk Island. They are perennials, forming large tufts, with rigid two-ranked sword-shaped radical leaves from a short thickened rootstock. They bear a tall leafless scape branching at the summit, with creet variegated.

lurid or yellow and red flowers in a terminal paniels. The largest variety produces green and gray leaves from 5 to 6 feet long, and deep orange-red flowers on a stalk 16 feet high. P. tenaz varietatis is the New Zealand flax (which see, under Ass.; 10), also called flax-bush. It is a very beautiful varietation of the laws decoration. The other varieties are cultivated also for their beauty, and especially for their fiber—the strongest vegetable fiber known. The plants are raised from the divided routs or from seeds, and are laxed in England. The fiber is now sold for making cordage, paper, etc., and gardeners use the leaves as cordage when simply torn into shreds.

Phoronis (fῷ-rẽ'nis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. Φορωνίς, of Phoroneus, ⟨ Φορωνίς, Phoroneus, a king of Argos.] A genus of Gephyrea, typical of the famgos.] A genus of Gephyrea, typical of the isu-ily Phorontile. They have a circlet of long tentacular appendages around the mouth, close to which the anns is situated. A pseudohemal system exists, and the fluid is said to contain red corpuscles. The embryo is mesotrochal, but has also two ciliated bands, one around the anus, the other behind the mouth, the latter being produced into a fringe of numerous tentaculiform lobes, in which state it is the so-called actinotroche.

phoronomia (for-ō-nō'mi-ä), n. [NL.: see pho phosphorescence (fos-fo-res'ens), n. [= F. phosphorescence = Sp. fosforescencia = Pg. phosphorescencia = It. fosforescenza; as phosphorescen(t) + -ce.] The state or character of being phosphorescent; the property which certain bodies possess of becoming luminous without undergoing combustion. Phosphorescence is sometimes a chemical, sometimes a physical action. When chemical, it consists essentially in allow oxidation attended with evolution of light, as in the case of phosphorays. When physical, it consists in the continuation of the more lecular vibrations causing the emission of light after the body has ceased to be exposed to the light-radiation (or, more generally, radiant energy) to which this motion is due; this is seen in the case of the diamond, chlorophane, sugar, barium and calcium sulphids, and many other substances. Phosphorescence is also produced in some crystals (diamond, calcite, etc.) by exposure to the electrical discharge in a vacuum-tube. The phosphorescence of the sea is produced by the scintillating or phosphorescent light emitted from the bodies of certain marine animals. The luminosity of plants is a condition under which certain plants (always, so far as now known, Thallophysics) evolve light. The so-called luminosity or phosphorescence of decaying wood is due to the presence of the mycelium of Aparicus malleus. Other luminous fungi are Aparicus clearius, A. Geneua, A. noestiva, and A. Gardnert. Various signs and distoms also exhibit this phenomenon. See cut under Noestivae. bodies possess of becoming luminous without phosphorescent (fos-fō-res'ent), a. and n. [= F. phosphorescent = Sp. fosforescent = Pg. phosphorescent = It. fosforescente; as phosphor + -escent. Cf. phosphoresce.] I. a. Shining with a faint light or luminosity like that of phosphorescent is the standard of the second that the second is the second that the second that the second is the second that the second is the second that a faint light or luminosity like that of phosphorus; luminous without sensible heat. Various animals are phosphorescent; as among intusoriana, the noctilueas (see cut under Noctiluea); among incusoriana, certain see-pens (Penastuia phosphorea, for example); among insects, the glow-worm and other beattes of the family Lessperids (see cut under Inservity); among ascidiana, the pyrosumes or firehodies; and some fishes. A number of mineral substances exhibit a similar property after having been exposed to a bright light, though from a different cause, as calcium chlorid, anhydrous calcium nitrate, the sulphids of barium, strentium, calcium (luminous paint), the diamond, some varieties of fluor-part, spatite, horax, and many other substances. Bome mineral bodies become phosphorescent when strongly heated, as a piece of lime. Be phosphorescence,—Phosphorescent dial, paint, photograph, etc. See the nona.

II. s. A substance having the property of phosphorescence, or luminosity without heat.

Gladal phosphoric acid. See glacial.—Phosphoric acid, Pfico (cometimes called orthophosphoric acid in contradistinction to metaphosphoric acid, an acid usually obtained by decomposing bone-ash, which consists chiefly of calcium phosphate, with sulphuric acid, and separating from foreign matters the phosphoric acid thus liberated. It is also produced by the cuidation of phosphorous acid, by oxidizing red phosphorus with nitric acid, by the decomposition of spatite and other native phosphates, and in various other ways. It is a coloriess odoriess syrup, with an intensely sour taste. It is tribasic, forming three distinct classes of motallic saits. The three atoms of hydrogen may in like manner be replaced by alcohol radicals forming acid and neutral ethers. Phosphoric acid is used in medicine as a tonic.

2. Chemical symbol, P; atomic weight, 31; specific gravity, 1.826. A solid non-metallic combustible substance, hitherto undecomposed, not found by itself in nature, but occurposed, not found by itself in nature, but occurring chiefly in combination with oxygen, calcium, and magnesium. It is widely distributed, being an essential constituent of all plants and of the bony tissue of animals. It was originally obtained from urine; but it is now manufactured from bones, which consist in large part of calcium phosphete. Common phosphorus, when pure, is semi-transparent and colorless. At common temperatures it is a soft solid, easily out with a knife, the cut surface having a waxy lustor; at 168 F. it fuses, and at 550 is converted into vapor. It is soluble, by the aid of heat, in naphtha, in fixed and volatile oils, and in sulphur chlorid, carbon disulphid, and phosphorus sulphid. It is exceedingly inflammable. Exposed to the air at common temperatures, it undergoes slow combustion, emits a white vapor of a peculiar garlic odor, and appears luminous in the dark. A very slight degree of heat is sufficient to inflame it in the open air. Gentle pressure between the fingers, friction, or a temperature not much above its points of fusion kindies it readily. It burns rapidly even in the air, emitting a splendid white light, and causing intense heat. Its combustion is far more rapid in oxygen gas, and the light far more vivid. The product of the perfect combustion of phosphorus is phosphorus pentoxid (P₂O₂), a white solid which readily takes up water, passing into phosphoric acid (which is e.g. under phosphoric). Phosphorus may be made to combine with most of the metals, forming compounds called phosphicles; when dissolved in fat oils it forms a solution which is luminous in the dark. It is chiefly used in the preparation of lucifer matches, and in the preparation of phosphore acid. It is used to some extent in medicine in nervous affections, but is virulently poisonous except in very minute doses. Phosphora presents accord example of allotropy, in that it can be exhibited in at ring chiefly in combination with oxygen, cally used in the preparation of lucifer matches, and in the preparation of phosphoric sold. It is used to some extent in medicine in nervous affections, but is virulently poisonous except in very minute doses. Phosphorus presents a good example of allotropy, in that it can be exhibited in at least one other form, known as red or ameryhous phosphorus, presents a completely different properties from common phosphorus. This variety is produced by keeping common phosphorus. This variety is produced by keeping common phosphorus for a long time alightly below the boiling-point. It is a red, hard, brittle substance, not fusible, not poisonus, and not readily inflammable, so that it may be handled with impunity. When heated to the boiling-point it changes back to common phosphorus.—Bolognas, Bolognian, or Bononian phosphorus, one of the most powerful of the solar phosphorus dustances. It is prepared by heating barium sulplate intensely with powdered charcoal, and filling with it while hot glass tubes, which are at once scaled. After exposure to sunlight, the mass phosphoresces in the dark with a bright orange-colored light.—Phosphorus bottle. (a) A contrivance for obtaining instantaneous light. The light is produced by stirring a plees of phosphorus about in a dry bottle with a hot wire, and introducing a sulplur match. It is now superseded by lucifer matches and similar contrivances. (b) A small bottle containing 12 grains of phosphorus metted in half an ounce of olive-oil. On being uncorked in the dark this solution emits light enough to filuminate the dial of a watch, and it will rotain this property for several years if not too frequently used.—Phosphorus pasts, a poisonous compound containing phosphorus, for the destruction of vermin, as rata, mice, cockroaches, etc.

Phosphorus—box. (for fō-rus—boks), s. A box containing oxymuriste matches, which first superseded the tinder-box.

When I was about 16 I joined in partnership with a man who used to make phosphorus bases. I sold them for him. A piece of phosphorus was stuck in a tin tube, the match was dipped into the phosphorus, and it would ignite by friction. Maybew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 373.

photochromy (fö'tö-krō-mi), n. [ζ Gr. φῶς (φωr-), light, + χρῶμα, color.] The art of reproducing colors by photography, or of producing photographic pictures in which the originals are shown in their natural colors. There is no processed by which natural colors can be registered. nals are shown in their natural colors. There is as yet no process by which natural colors can be registered by photography by a single or simple operation, in such form that the resulting picture will be permanent. By the device of taking as separate negative for every color in the subject, using in every case such chemicals or methods as will reproduce only the desired color, and afterward combining prints or matrices from all the negatives, every one in its appropriate color, a remarkably close approximation is made to the natural appearance of the sub-ject. This process is peculiarly adapted to the reproduc-tion of such works of art as jewels, tapestries, potteries, and enamels.

φως (φωτ-), light, + E. ougraving.] A common name for many processes by which a photo-graph may be made to afford a plate-matrix from which can be taken prints in ink corresponding to the printing of the photo-graph in the care in the corresponding to the printing of the photo-graph in many contents. graph may be made to afford a plate-matrix from which can be taken prints in ink corresponding to the original of the photographic image. These processes depend upon the property, peacesed by potasium bichromate and analogous chemicals, of rendering insoluble, under the action of light, gelatin or some similar body with which they are compounded. By applications of this property, varying according to the process, a picture or design can be preduced on a metal surface, and the blank places etched out with acid; or a matrix in relief can be formed, from which an electrotype plate can be made in ordinary ways. In general, the term photo-engraving is limited to a relief-block or-plate produced by photographic means for printing in an ordinary printing-press, to the art of making such blocks, and to prints from them; while the term photographic is commonly applied to a protographic allusing such allows a print from it. In the Gillet process a zinc plate coated with asphaltum is exposed beneath a negative, and to a print from it. In the Gillet process a zinc plate coated with asphaltum is exposed beneath a negative, and those portions unchanged by light are dissolved. The gine is then etched. Photographs are reproduced in the form of half-tone plates for use in the printing-press by several methods, all of which depend upon breaking up the surface of the picture by dark lines in regular series. A gelatin film on which such a series of lines has been photographed is placed between the sensitised surface which is to receive the impression and a positive picture. The resulting print will consist of the subject appearing in half-tone on a ground of lines, and from it a typographical matrix is prepared in the usual ways. (For an example of a half-tone plate, see cut under dehadrachm.) Also called photographic engrewing, photographic-process printing, photographic engreeses. The rays which are in general most active in this way are those of the upper part of the spectrum, as the blue, violet, and ultra-violet rays. The red and yellow rays produce a much less marked effect on an ordinary sensitive plate; but it has been found possible to prepare a special gelatinobromide plate which is highly sensitive even to the less refrangible rays, as those in the infra-red region of the spectrum. (See spectrum.) Protography rests on the fact that silver nitratain various other chemicals are decomposed by certain colarnays and reduced, becoming dark or black, or in other ways affected, according to the intensity and amount of actinic rays received on them. The process consists (i) in properly exposing a surface made sensitive to actinic rays received on them. The process consists (i) in properly exposing a surface made sensitive to actinic rays received on them. The process consists (i) in properly exposing a surface made sensitive to actinic rays received on them. The process consists (i) in properly exposing a surface made sensitive to activity of processes, in the merchanical production of positive copies from it. The knowledge of the principle on which photography depends resches hack to the time of the alchemists, who discovered that silver chlorid exposed to the surface which have not been surface which have not been surface. Wedgewood and Davy in 1802 attempted to apply this fact to artistle purposes by throwing the shadow of an object on a sheet of white paper, or, preferably, of leather, covered with a solution of silver nitrate and exposed to the surface which have no plates of copper or power covered with a solution of silver nitrate and exposed to the surface which sensitive to physical process of obtaining pictures on sensitive to which the paper, and the solution

[< F. photogravure, < Gr., eòr, (eur.), light, + F. gravure, engraving.] The art of producing on metal, by an application of the action of light on a sensitived surface, often surmanemented by atching. graving.] The art of producing on metal, by an application of the action of light on a sensitized surface, often supplemented by etching, an incised engraved plate for printing. There are several processes by which this may be accomplished. According to the Niepce process, which is suitable for the reproduction of line-engravings, a copperplate is coated with bitumen and is then exposed to light benesth a negative. The resulting print is brought out with olive-oil and turpentine, or with oil of spike, which dissolves the parts acted on by light and acts little on the rest, and the lines remain as bare copper. The plate is then etched. In the Fox-Tailot process the gelatin print is transferred to copper which has had a grain given to it by sprinkling the surface with powdered resin and then warming it. (See accustint.) The plate is then etched with ferric acid, which renders the opaque portions of the gelatin film insoluble and impermeable. The acid should be weak and kept in motion during the biting, until the uncovered parts have been sufficiently attacked. To increase the regularity of the ercoion, the plate should first be immersed in a weak solution of copper sulphate. In the Woodbury process, which resembles the Goupil process, egalatin picture in relief is applied under pressure upon a plate of soft metal, and is repeated on the metal in relief and depression. The mold thus formed is filled with pigmented gelatin, over which a sheet of paper which is to receive the picture, retain the most gelatin, and when the paper is lifted it raises the gelatin from the mold in such a manner that it forms a picture in low relief. In order to obtain a grained surface which will hold printing-ink, pounded glass may be mixed with the gelatin.

burner on the side of m. Images of both sides of the illuminated disk are simultaneouslyseen at m m by reflection from the mirrors at a and s'. at which the light from two sources produces equal intensities of illumination. One of the most common photometers is that of Burnen, which comains of a screen of white paper with a grease-spot in its center. The lights to be compared are placed on opposite sides of this screen, and their distances are a salinated that the grease-spot appears neither brighter nor darker than the rest of the paper, from whichever side it is viewed. When the distances have not been correctly adjusted, the grease-spot will appear darker than the rest of the paper when viewed from the side on which the illumination is most intente, and lighter than the rest of the paper when viewed from the other side. The intensities of the two lights are to one another as the squares of the distances from the screen at which they must be placed in order that the grease-spot may appear neither brighter nor darker than the rest of the paper. Another form is Rumford's photometer, which employs a screen in front of which is placed a vertical rod; the positions of the sources of light are so adjusted that the two shadows which they cast are sensibly equal.

Dispersion photometer, a form of photometer by means of which the intensity of a brilliant light, as that of an electric are, may be determined. photophone (fö'tῷ-fôn), n. [ζ Gr. φῶς (φωτ-), light, + φωνή, sound, voice: see phonel.] An instrument by which a beam of light may be made to transmit spoken words to a distance.

One form consists of a thin mirror of silvered mica which receives the vibrations from the person speaking, and upon which a beam of light falls at the same time. This light is reflected to the receiving-point at a distance. There it falls upon a concave mirror, and is brought to a focus upon a scienium-cell. The variation in the light produces a corresponding variation in the electrical resistance of the scienium, and this reproduces the spoken words in a telephone connected with it.

words in a telephone connected with it.

In the earlier papers describing it ithe radiophone and the experiments which led to its invention it is called photophone, because at that time the effects were supposed to be wholly due to light. Afterwards, in order to avoid ambiguity, fell changed the name to radiophone, and anguested that, to distinguish between instruments depending on the different kinds of radiation, the names photophone, thermophone, &a., should be employed.

photopolarimeter (fō-tō-pō-la-rim'c-ter), π. [< Gr. φως (φωr-), light, + E. polarimeter.] A form of polarimeter devised (1885) by Cornu. It has a doubly refracting prism mounted at one end of a tube, which at the other has a disphragm of such size that the lorders of the two images, polarized at right angles, just coincide with each other. A nicol prism suitably mounted is made to revolve until these images have the same intensity, when the angular position of its plane of vibration gives a ready means of determining the degree of polarization in the light under examination.

photo-process (ιστο-pros-es), n. [ζ (dr. φως (φωr-), light, + Ε. process.] Any process or method by which is produced, by the agency of photography, a matrix in relief or in intaglic from which prints on he model in the core. from which prints can be made in ink; especially, the photographic production of reliefciatly, the photographne production of renerplates from which impressions are struck off in an ordinary printing-press. It thus includes photogravine, but is especially applicable to such processes of photo-engraving as photolithography and photography. The chief kinds of photo-process are differentiated as follows. Hellotype is the production of a matrix in gelatin, from which printing is done directly in a lifthographic press. Photogravine is the production of include or intaglic plates in metal. Photo-engraving is (properly) the production of releft-plates of any kind suited for printing, together with type, in an ordinary printing-press; though the term is often used to include photogravine also. Photo-engraving is particularly applicable to the reproduction of pen-drawings; when used for pictures, such as ordinary photographs, it is necessary, in order to admit of printing, to employ some such device as the formation over the whole surface of the plate of an even sories of fine lines, or a finely docted or attepled ground. Such plates are called half-tone plates. (See half-tone process, under photo-engraving.) Also used attributively to note a relief-plate, or an impression from such a plate, made by photo-process.

The theory that the mental powers of the individual consist of independent faculties, each of which has its seat dependent faculties, each of which has its seat in a definite brain-region, whose size is commensurate with the power of manifesting this particular faculty. This theory, which originated at the close of the eightcouth century, assumes, moreover, as an essential part, the plasticity of the eranial envelop, by which the skull conforms externally, in the normal subject, to the shape and configuration of the brain within, so that its form and faculties may be determined, with sufficient exactness, from the skull itself, whether in the akeleton or in the living person. The different powers of the mind or faculties are divided into two classes, the feelings and the intellect, or the affective and intellectual faculties, the former of which is again divided into the propensities and sentiments, the latter into the perceptive and reflective faculties. Each of these groups, as well as each of the individual faculties composing them, is located upon the atterior of the skull with more or less exactness, and it is by the prominence or depression of the different regions that the mental powers and faculties are ascertained. The system was founded by 1r. Franz Joseph Gall (1758–1828), a Viennese physician, and was extended and promulgated by his pupil and associate, Dr. Spursheim, and by George and Andrew Combe and others. The term is sometimes applied, in the phrase new phresology, to the localization of cerebral functions which has been established by experimental and pathological investigations, almost exclusively of the last twenty years, and which has reached such a degree of certainty and definiteness as to furnish a basis for surgical operations on the hrain. But there is nothing in common between modern cerebral localization and the views of Gall and Spursheim. See cut in next column.

Phrynida (frin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Phrynus + -idæ.] A family of pulmonate Arachnida of the order Phrynida or Thelyphonida, typified by the genus Phrynus. The abdomen is fat, oval, and eleven-jointed; the postabdomen is a mere rudiment, like a button; the cephalothorax is fat, and covered with a horny carapace; the pedipalps are long, strong, six-jointed, and variously armed, but their terminal claw does not form a pincer; the first pair of legs are extremely long, slender, palpiform or even antenniform, and multiarticulate, the fifth and sixth joints being divided into ninety or more subjoints; and the eyes are eight in number, two in the central anterior region, and a cluster of three on each side. The species resemble spiders with (apparently) long feelers and a pair of great claws. They are readily distinguished from the only other family (Thelyphonidae) of this order by not having a long taff like a scorpion. They are nocturnal and alugaha, and live under stones and logs. Compare also out under Pedipalsi.

Phrynorhombus (fri-nō-rom' bus), n. [NL. (Gdinther, 1862), < Gr. φρῦνος, a toad, + ἐράμβος, a turbot.] A genus of flatishes of the family Pleuroneotides, having no vomerine teeth. P. snimaoulaises is known as the topknot.

is usual in related lizards. The head is surmounted with several pairs of stout spines, largest in some of the southerly and Mexican forms, and the whole upper surface of the body is roughly granular or tuberculous; the under side is smooth. The coloration of the upper parts is variegated with black, brown, gray, and reddish, in a blotched pattern, and varies greatly, not only with the different species, but in different individuals of the same kind. The creatures have nothing of the agility of most lizards; they are clumsy in their motions, rather aluggish, and cannot jump. They are perfectly harmless, become tame as soon as handled, and are often kept as pets for their oddity. They feed on files and other insects, but can fast long, and may be safely sent by mail alive to any part of the United States. They bring forth alive. One species (P. douglast) occurs as far north at least as the British boundary of the United States.

Phyllanthes (fi-lan'thë-ë), n. pl. [NL. (Bartling, 1830), < Phyllanthus + -cæ.] A tribe of plants of the order Euphorbiaccæ, distinguished by carpels with two contiguous ovules in the central angle, and the seed-leaves much broad-central angle, and the seed-leaves much broader than the radicle. It includes 54 genera, mainly tropical, of which Phyllanthus is the type. For other principal genera, see Futranjiou and Tooloodendron.

Phyllanthus (fi-lan'thus), n. [NL. (Linneus. 1737), so called from species with flowers seated on leaf-like flattened branches; < Gr. φύλλου, a leaf, + ἀνίος, flower (cf. L. phyllanthes, < Gr. φύλλουθίς, a plant with prickly leaves, probactions).] A large genus of plants, of the order Enphorbiaccæ, type of the tribe Phyllantheæ, characterized by the entire alternate leaves and apetalous monoecious flowers, the male in glomerate clusters and with from two to six glomerate clusters and with from two to six stamens, and by the pistil consisting of from three to many carpels, their two-cleft styles not stamens, and by the pistil consisting of from three to many carpels, their two-cleft styles not dilated below the apex. There are shout 450 species, very widely dispersed throughout the warmer parts of the world, rurer in temperate climates. They are either herbs, shrubs, or trees, of great variety in appearance. The leaves are generally two-ranked, and so arranged as to make the branches resemble pinnate leaves. The small greenish flowers are axillary or at the nodes of leafless and often flattened branches, and are often tinged with yellow or purple. Soveral species are in medicinal repute as diureties in India, as P. Niruri and P. urinaria. The bruised leaves of P. Conami are there used to stupely fish. (Compare Piscidia.) Many species are cultivated under the name leaf-flower, from the blooming leaf-like branch es, or cladedia. (See cut under deadeds.) The snow-bush, cultivated for its white flowers, is P. ninzis, native of the Now Hebrides. Many others are cultivated as ornamental evergreen shrubs under the names of Emblica and Xylophylla, the latter a numerous group of wood-branched shrubs with orange-red flowers, chiefly from the West Indies. For other species, see Otabette posseberry (under myrobalan). The last produces an edible fruit, used for preserves and in dyeing and tanning, and long famed as an astringent medicine (but not now so used), and a durable wood, used for implements, building, and furniture in India and Burna. The so-called Otahette gooseberry is also known as star-gooseberry.

These singularly degenerate and simple molluaks have no ctenidis, cerata, mantie-akirt, or other processes of the bodywall, even the foot being aborted. The intestine ends on the right side, and the head has two long tentacles. They are now sometimes ranked with Polybranchiats in a distinct section called Abrancha, but were formerly referred to the pteropods, the heteropods, and even the tunicates. Also called ocean sugs and Psilosomata.

phyllopod (fil'ō-pod), a. and n. [< NI. *phyllopus (-pod-), < Gr. φέλλον, leaf, + πους (ποσ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having foliaceous feet; having the limbs expanded and flattened like leaves; specifically, of or pertaining to the Phyllopoda.

II. s. A crustacean of the order Phyllopoda.

Phyllopoda (fi-lop'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL.: see phyllopod.] 1. An order of entomostracous crustaceans, the leaf-footed crustaceans, sometimes forming (with Ostracopoda and Cladoceans). erustaceans, the leaf-footed crustaceans, sometimes forming (with Ustracopoda and Cladocera) a suborder of Branchiopoda. In Intrelle's classification the phyllopeds were a section of his branchiopoda, corresponding to the modern order of Phyllopoda, and divided into (a) Ceratophthalma, with the genera Ismactia and Estheria (composing the modern family Etherialee) and Artennia and Branchipus (the modern family Etherialee) and Artennia and Branchipus (the modern family Etherialee) and Artennia and Branchipus (the modern family Branchipodides), and (b) Aspidophora, with the genera Apus and Lepidurus (the modern family Apodidee or Apussite). The feet in phyllopads are very variable in number, and those of the locomotory series are membranous or foliaceous, as implied in the name. Excepting in Branchipodides, the body bears a very large carapace, which in the Limactides takes the form of a bivalve shell with a hinge, closed by adductor muscles, into which the legs can be withdrawn. But this carapace is not a cephaloltorax as is usual in crustaceans. Two pairs of antennes are usually present. The mouth-parts are a pair of maxille, and in some forms a pair of maxille, sometimes swarming in vast numbers. The species of Artennia, as A. salina, are known as brine-skripps. The phyllopods are an old type, going back to the Devonian, and have some resemblance to tri-lobites. See cuts under Apus, Estherides, and Limactia. 2. In conoch., in J. E. Gray's classification (1821), one of several orders of Conchophora, containing dimyarian bivalive mollusks having the foot lamellar or olonyate. ing dimyarian bivalve mollusks having the foot lamellar or elongate.

They were by Latrelle made the second family of Stomatopoda, under the name of Bipeltate, composed of forms which are remarkable for their rounded shape and the transparency of their teguments. They are now known to be larval forms of macrurous decapods, as Palimeridæ and Septlaridæ. The name is retained for such larvas. See cut under glass-crab.

Phyllostachys (fi-los'tā-kis), n. [NL. (Siebold and Zuccarini, 1837), so called with ref. to the leaf-boaring lower branches of the inflorescence; < Gr. φύλλον, leaf, + στάχες, spike.] A genus of arborescent grasses, of the tribe Bambuseæ and subtribe Arundinarieæ, character-buses and subtribe Arundinaries, characterized by the one- to four-flowered spikelets, in spikes partly included within imbricated spaspikes partly included within imbricated spathaccous bracts. They are tall grasses with cylindrical culins and prominent nodes, producing numerous dense or loose panicipal spikes, and short-petioled leaves, jointed with the sheath and teasedlated with little transverse velulets. The 4 or 5 species are natives of China and Japan, resemble the bamboo, and furnish material for walking-sticks and hamboo chairs. P. nigra is the wanghee-cane of China, with black, nearly solid stems reaching 25 feet. P. bambucides is a dwarf species from which yellowish canes are made.

Phyllostomatidæ (fil'ō-stō-mat'i-dō), n. pl. [NL., < Phyllostoma (-stomat-) + -idæ.] A family of tropical and subtropical American bats ily of tropical and subtropical American bats of the emballonurine series. They have a nose-leaf or other cutaneous appendages of the suout (somewhat as in Rhinolophide or horseshoe-leats, which are, however, of a different alliance (the vespertillonine)), three phalanges of the middle finger, and large middle upper incisors. The eyes are comparatively large, and there is a distinct tragus (wanting in Rhinolophides). The family includes the vampire-bats, some of which are true blood-suckers, as the genera Desmodon and Dichylls. The presence of variously formed appendages of the smoot has often caused bats of this group to be confused with the horseshoe-bats; but the presence of a tragus alone is sufficient to distinguish the phyllostomes. Leading genera are Mormops, Compring, Phyllostoma, Gloscophage. Stronderma, and Demodon. The family is divisible into Phyllostomatines and Lobostomatine. Also Phyllostomides.

Phyllostomatinæ (fil-o-sto-ma-ti'nē), n. pl. [Nl., < Phyllostoma (-stomat-) + -ine.] A sub-family of New World bats of the family Phyllo-stomatida, having a distinct diversiform nose-leaf and either foliaceous or warty appendages phyllotactic (fil-ō-tak'tik), a. [< phyllotaxis, after tactic.] Of or pertaining to phyllotaxis. phyllotaxis (fil-ō-tak'sis), n. [NL.: see phyllotaxy.] In bot., the distribution or arrangement of leaves on the stem; also, the laws louary.] In bot, the distribution or arrangement of leaves on the stem; also, the laws collectively which govern such distribution. Leaves are distributed so as to economize space and give a good exposure to light; and to accomplish this they are arranged in a variety of ways, which all fall under two principal modes. These are the verticillate or quetical, in which there are two or more leaves at the same height of the stem, and the alternate or spiral, in which the leaves stand singly, one after another. In the verticillate arrangement the leaves form a succession of whoris or circles around the stem, with two, three, four, five, or more in each whorl. In the alternate or spiral arrangement the leaves are distributed singly at different heights of the stem and at equal intervals. The simplest is the two-ranked or distributed singly at different heights of the stem and at equal intervals. The simplest is the two-ranked or distributed singly at different heights of the stem and at equal intervals. The simplest is the two-ranked or distributed singly at different heights of the stem and the third is the furthest possible from the large alternately on exactly opposite sides of the stem. The second leaf is therefore the furthest possible from the socond, and consequently is exactly over the first, and so on. They thus form two vertical ranks in which the angular divergence in half the circumference, or 180°. In all cases the angular divergence may be represented by a fraction, in which the number of vertical rows thus formed, from which the class of phyllotaxis takes its name, as the tristichous or three-ranked (1), bepullotaxy (fil o-tak-si), n. 2. [l. c.] A member of this genus, especially the species just named, known as the grape-vine phylloxera and vine-pest, the worst enemy of the European or vinifera grape. The fact that a vine-disease which had long existed in southern France was due to this insect was discovered in 1865 by Planchon, who described the insect as P. vastairis. The species had been named before (though Planchon's name holds by common consent); for in 1854 Fitch had described an American gall-louse on grape-leaves as Pomphojus vitifylois, and this was identified with the European root-louse (*Phylocarra vendatrics) by Riley in 1870. The same discovery was made by European observers in the same year. It is now established that the native country of this phyllocara is North America east of the Rocky Mountains from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, whence it spread to Europe, and more recently to California, South Africa, New Zealand, and Australia. The insect exists under two distinct forms: the root-form, called radictola, on the roots of the vine, and the gall-form, called radictola, on the roots of the vine, and the grape. The galls are transient, being numerous one year and scarce the next. The root-form is like the gall-form at first, but later acquires certain characteristic tubercles. The phylloxera hibernates as a winter egg above or below ground, or as a young larva on the roota. Late in the summer a generation of winged aganite females is produced; these fit abroad and spread the peat. One of the females lays from three to eight delicate eggs in or on the ground or on the under side of the leaf, and from these eggs issue the true males and females have been awarded without the intervention of a winged generation, but this is exceptional. The wingless hypogas female may occasionally lay eggs which bring forth the sexual brood without the intervention of a winged generation, but this is exceptional. The wingless individuals spread from vine to vine, and the winged ones carry the pest from one vineyard to another. The symptoms of the discase above ground are the yellowing of the leaves the second year and the death of the vines susceptible to this infestation include all the varieties of the Vi

C); Ms, mandble: Ms, maxilla: N N, maxilla openings, the bones not represented; Pasz, Ponz, premaxillaries of right and left sides (unsymmetrical): Po., parintal: Pl., palatine; Pf., preryod; Sg, aquanosal; St, sapracoccipital; Po., vomer; BS, basisphenoid; AS, alisphenoid;

of the body; the blow-hole is near the edge of the snout; and the brain-cavity is declivous. P. macrocephatus is the common cachalot, from which spermacet is obtained. Also called Catadan. See also cut under Catadana.

Physeteridæ (fis-ë-ter'i-dë), s. pl. [NL., < Physeter + -idæ.] 1. A family of existent delphinoid Cetacca, of the group Delphinoidea, having functional teeth in the lower jaw only, and ing functional teeth in the lower law only, and the skull strongly asymmetrical. To this family belong the sporm-whales proper (Physetering), and such forms as the bottle-nosed whale (Hyperoidon). 2. In stricter use, a family of sperm-whales, typified by the genus Physeter, and containing the subfamilies Physetering and Royting, or and rowth a parameters and Royting, or and rowth a parameter and rowth as the bare ordinary and pygny sperm-whales. They have the head neither rostrate nor marginate; the snout high toward the front and projecting beyond the mouth; the skull high behind or returnely convex; the supracecipi-tal bone projecting forward laterally to or beyond the vertical of the temporal forms, and the frontal bones visible above as erect triangular or retroracly falciform wedges between the maxillaries and the supracceipital. Some-times called Catedontides.

times called Catodonidae.

Physeterines (fi-se-te-ri'ne), n. pl. [NL., < Physeter + -ine.] 1. The typical subfamily of the Physeterides, containing the genera Physeter and Koqia.—2. This subfamily restricted, by the exclusion of the genus Kogia as the type of a separate subfamily, to the ordinary large sperm-whales of the genus Physeter.

physeterine (ff-sē'te-rin), a. and s. [< physeter + -inc¹.] I. a. Like or related to a sperm-whale;

of or pertaining to the Physoterinse.

II. n. A member of the Physoterine.

physeteroid (fi-sē'te-roid), a. and n. [< physoter + -oid.] I. a. Belonging to the Physoteroidea, or having their characters; resembling the general physoterial indicates.

or having their enaracters; resembling the genus Physeter; xiphioid.

II. n. A member of the Physeteridæ, in either sense; a xiphioid. Eucyc. Brit., XV. 303.

Physeteroidea (fi-sē-te-roi'dē-ii), n. pl. [NL., < Physeter-idea.] The Physeteridæ, in sense 2, regarded as a superfamily. Gill.

physharmonica (fis-hir-mon'i-ki), n. [NL., < Gr. döm. bellows. + NL. harmonica, q, v,] A

Gr. $\tilde{\text{ora}}, \text{ bellows, } + NL. \text{ harmonica, } q. v.] A small reed-organ originally intended to be attached to a pinnoforte, so as to sustain melodies. It was invented in 1818, and was the precursor

See Chartist.—Physical fraction. See astronomical fraction, under fraction.—Physical geography, that branch of science which has for its object the comparison and generalization of geographeal facts. It differs thenly from geology in that it regards the present rather than the past condition of the earth, but many authors include in their text-books of physical geography more or less of that which is geography may be subdivided into various branches, of which the most important are—organish, the study of mountain-chains, and in general of the relief of the surface, in which branch geology can only with difficulty be separated from geography; theleasography, the study of the cocan, its outline, depths, currents, lemperature, salinity, and the nature and distribution of animal and vegetable life on and beneath its surface; hydrography, the study of the river-systems, rivers, and lakes; climatology, the practical side of metocology, or the study of the climatic conditions of various parts of the carth's surface; botanical geography, the study of the racos of man and their distribution of plants; policyleal geography, the distribution of animal life; and, finally, stanclogy and anthropology, the branch of the racos of man and their distributions of the scoops, the study of the racos of man and their distributions, and their manners and customs. The last two branches, however, are special sciences, and are rarely treated, except in the most succinct manner, in the text-books of physical geography.—Physical geology, the study of the geological changes which have taken place on the earth's surface, and of the causes by which these events have been brought about; geology separated, as far as possible, from paleoutology, or from any consideration of the order of succession and the nature of organic life upon the globe, and of the classification of the stratified formations in accordance therewith.—Physical horison, indiux, mineralogy, necessity, optics. See the nome.

physically (fiz'i-kal-i), adv. 1. In a physical manner; according to nature; according to physics or natural philosophy; not intellectually or morally.

1 am not now treating physically of light or colours.

2t. According to the art or rules of medicine. And for physic, he [Lord Bacon] did indeed live physically, but not miserably.

Randey, in Spedding's Bacon, I. 55.

moral; material; bodily: as, physical and physical strength.

Labour, then, in the physical world is always and solely employed in putting objects in motion; the properties of matter, the laws of nature, do the rest.

"Real and physical things," Spinosa tella us, "cannot be understood so long as their essence is unknown."

Velick, Introd. to Descartes's Method. p. xcvi.

3. External; obvious to the senses; cognizable through a bodily or material organization: as, the physical characters of a mineral: opposed to chemical. See mechanical.—4t. Of or pertaining to physic, or the art of curing disease or preserving health, or one who professes or practises this art; of or pertaining to a physician.

The that lives physicals, including the physical things, including the physical, motion, physician, physician, phisician, physician, censed by some competent authority, such as a medical college, to treat diseases and pre-scribe remedies for them; a doctor; a medical mail. The physician as a prescriber of remedies is distinguished from the pharmacist, whose business is the compounding or preparing of medicines, and from the surgeon, who performs remedial operations. The last, however, often follows the practice of medicine, as does the licensed apothocary in England.

Reint Poul him self was there a Phistoyen, for to kepen mennes Bodies in hele, before he was converted; and after that he was Phisicien of Soules.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 123.

It sometimes falls out that he that visits a sick Man is forced to be a Fighter instead of a Physician.

N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Rrasmus, I. 324.

He was less directly embarrassing to the two physiciens than to the surgeon-apothecaries who attended paupers by contract.

George Riiot, Middlemarch, xviii.

2t. A student of physics; a naturalist; a physicist; specifically, in medieval universities, a student of the Aristotelian physics.

physiciancy (fi-zish'an-si), n.; pl. physiciancies (-siz). [< physician + -cy.] Appointment as physician; the post or office of physician.

He had in the previous year put himself forward as a candidate for a physiciancy to St. George's Hospital.

Lancet, No. 3428, p. 711.

physicianed (fi-zish'and), a. [< physician + -ed².] Made a physician; educated or licensed as a physician. [Rare.]

In the progress of the species from savagery to advanced dvilisation, anthropomorphism grows into theology, while physicism (if I may so call it) develops into science. Huzley, Lay Sermons, p. 168.

physicist (fix'i-sist), π. [< Gr. ψουκά, physics (see physics), + -tst.] 1. A student of physics; a natural philosopher.

I do not think there is a doubt in the mind of any com-petent physicist or physiciogist that the work done in lift-ing the weight of the arm is the mechanical equivalent of a certain proportion of the energy set free by the molecu-lar changes which take place in the muscle.

Hunley, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 496.

2. In biol., one who seeks to explain fundamental vital phenomena upon purely physical or chemical principles; one who holds that life or enemical principles; one who holds that life is a form of energy due simply to molecular movements taking place in the ultimate molecules of the protoplasm, and capable of correlation with the ordinary physical and chemical forces: opposed to vitalist. H. A. Nicholson. physicky (fix'i-ki), a. [\physic(k)+-y^1.] Like physic or drugs.

Some authors name it cands pavonis, on account of its inimitable beauty; the flowers have a physicky smell. Grainger, Sugar Cane, i., note 520.

physic-nut (fiz'ik-nut), π. See Jatropha.

physicomental (fiz'i-kō-men'tal), a. [< Gr. evenor, physical, + E. montal.] Pertaining to physical and mental phenomena or their mutual relations.

In the first case we have the cosmological and physicotheological proofs of the existence of God; in the second, the ontological.

Adamsen, Philos. of Kant.

physicotheology (fiz"i-kō-thō-ol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. would, physics, + θεολογία, theology.] Theology illustrated or enforced by natural philos-

pound, neut. pl., physics: see physic.] Natural philosophy; experimental philosophy; the science of the principles operative in inorganic ral philosophy; experimental philosophy; the science of the principles operative in inorganic nature; the science of forces or forms of energy. Before the rise of modern science, physics was usually defined as the science of that which is movable, or the science of natural bodies. It was commonly made to include all natural science. At present, vital phenomena are not considered objects of physics, which is divided into general and applied physics. General physics investigates the general phenomena of inorganic nature, determines their laws, and measures their constants. It embraces four branches—(1) mechanics or dynamics, the science of force in general, with extensive mathematical developments; (2) the science of gravitation, also mainly mathematical; (3) molecular physics, the study of the constitution of matter, and of the forces within and between its molecules, including elasticity and heat (an indivisible subject), cohesion, and chemical forces; and (4) the physics of the star, being the study of light or radiation, electricity, and magnetism. Chemistry is for the time being divorced from physics, being chiefly occupied with the description of the formation of different kinds of substances. Applied physics uses the discoveries of general physics, in connection with special observations, in order to explain the phenomena of the universe. Its chief branches are astronomy, geology, and meteorology; to which may be added terrestrial magnetism, mineralogy, and some other subjects.

Physical (fis'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Physa + -idæ.]

A family of hygrophilous pulmoniferous gastropods, typified by the genus Physia, formerly included in Limmaridæ. The animal has setiform tentacles; the jaw is single, and has a fibrous prolongation; the radula has central multicuspid teeth; and the lateral as well as the marginal teeth are pectinate or serriform. The shell is sinistral and generally polished. The species abound in freah water in various parts of the world.

physicorat (fiz'i-ō-krat), n. [< Gr. $\psi_0 \text{crac}$; nature, + $\pi_0 \text{crac}$; rule: see physicoracy.] One who advocates the doctrines of physicoracy; who advocates the doctrines of physiceracy; specifically, one of a group of French philosophers and political economists, followers of François Quesnay (1694-1774), which rose to prominence in the latter half of the eighteenth entury, and maintained that a natural constitution or order exists in society, the violation of which has been the cause of all the evils suffered Which has been the cause of all the evils suffered by man. A fundamental right derived from this constitution or order was held to be freedom of person, of opinion, of property, and of contract or exchange. The physicorats regarded land or raw materials as the sole source of wealth, leaving out of account the elements of labor and capital, and denying the dogma of the mercantile system that wealth consists in the precious metals. They maintained that, as wealth consisted entirely in the produce hand, all revenue should be raised by a direct tax on land. They advocated complete freedom of trade and the doctrine of laiser-fairs. See physicoracy.

physiography (fiz-i-og'ra-fi), n. [= F. physiographic = Sp. fisiografia = Pg. physiographia = It. fisiografia, ζ Gr. φύσις, nature, + -γραφία, ζ γράen, write.] A word of rather variable meaning, but, as most generally used, nearly or quite the equivalent of physical geography (which see, under physical). Also called geophysics.

This term [physical geography] as here used is synonymous with Physiography, which has been proposed in its stead. Gelkie, Elem. Lessons in Phys. Geog., p. 3, note. For the use of the word physiography by Huxley, as meaning a peculiar kind of physical geography, see the following quotation.

The attempt to convey scientific conceptions without the appeal to observation which can alone give such conceptions firmness and reality appears to me to be in direct antagonism to the fundamental principles of scientific education. Physicagraphy has very little to do with this sort of "Physical Geography."

Huxley, Physicapphy (2d ed.), vii.]

Microscopic physiography. Same as hthology or petrography: a term thus far used only in the translation from the German of an important work by Rosenbusch, bearing the title "Mikroskopische Physiographie."

physiolatry (fix-i-ol'z-tri), n. [⟨ (ir. φίσις, nature, + λατρεία, worship.] The worship of the powers or agencies of nature; nature-worship.

A pantheistic philosophy based on the physiolatry of the Vodas.

physiologer (fiz-i-ol'ō-jer), n. [< physiolog-y + -or1.] A physical philosopher, or philosopher of the Ionic school. See lonic.

The generality of the old phiniologies before Aristotle and Democritus did pursue the atomical way, which is to resolve the corporeal phenomena, not into forms, qualities, and species, but into figures, motions, and phancies.

Physocalymma (fi'sō-kā-lim'ā), n. [NL. (Pohl, 1827), ζ (fr. φῦσα, a bladder, + κάλυμμα, a covering (calyx): see Calymma.] A genus of polypetalous trees of the order Lythraries and tribe Lythrew, characterized by the change of the fourcelled ovary in fruit into a small one-celled and many-seeded thin-walled capsule, inclosed withmany-seeded thin-walled capsule, inclosed within the enlarged bladdery cally. The only species, P. forthendem, is a Brasilian tree with opposite oblong roughish leaves and ample terminal loose-flowered purple panicles. Each flower is composed of two broad concave bracts which at first inclose the roundish flower-bud, an eight-toothed and boll-shaped purple cally, eight wavy petals, and a row of twenty-four long stamens bearing curved versatile anthers. The beautifully striped rose-colored wood is the tuity-sood of English calinet-makers, also known as Brasilian planesood. See tuity-sood. physocele (fi sc-scil), n. Müller in 1845, containing those whose air-bladder, when present, is connected with the alimentary canal ent, is connected with the alimentary canal by an air-duct, the bladder thus having an eutlet or mouth: contrasted with Physocisti. The order was divided by Müller into 2 suborders and 14 families. It includes most of the abdominal malacopterygian fishes of the older authors. In Cope's system of classification it is ranked as a primary group of actinopterons fishes, with the basilar segments of the ventral finrudimental and abdominal, the parietal bones usually united, branchiostegal rays developed, and the pneumatic duct open. It includes, in addition to the forms recognized by Müller, certain ganoids, as the Amidde Corder Halecomorphis and Lepidosteids (order Ginglymods). See cuts under Percopsis, pite, and Esox.

(Ruis and Pavon, 1798), so called with reference to the hard albumen, called vegetable ivory; (Gr. evrov, plant, + ilique, ivory; see elephant.] An aberrant genus of palms, type of the tribe Phytelephantine, and from its singularity long separated as an order Phytelephantes (Martius, 1835). arated as an order Phytelephantese (Martius, 1835). It is unlike all other palms in its numerous stamens, fillform stigmas, and unbranched spadices, and in the elongated petals of its female flower. There are 3 species, natives of Peru and the United States of Colombia, known from the nut as toopypalm. They are dioxide, known from the nut as toopypalm. They are dioxide, trobust trunk sometimes of seet high from a creeping and prostrate base often 20 feet long. They bear a crown of a dosen or more pinnate leaves, reaching 18 or 20 feet in length, resembling those of the coccanut-palm, and used by the natives in roofing. The male trees are tailer, and bear a fleshy and pendulous cylindrical fragrant spadix about 4 feet long, crowded with small flowers between minute bracts, each with about thirty-six stamens, and exhaling a penetrating odor of almonda. The female tree produces a shorter and erect spadix, six or eight at once, each with six or seven pure-white flowers, which are far the largest among palms, with from five to ten fleshy petals (each from 2 to 3 inches long), three papery triangular sepals, numerous imperfect stamens, and a roundish overy with from four to nine furrows, carpiels, and stigmas, becoming a drupe in fruit. The mass of six or seven drupes from one spadix consolidates into a heavy pendulous globosc synearp, or multiple fruit (from its size known locally as negro's-kead), covered with hard woody prominences. Each drupe contains about six large seeds; these, when young, are filled with a clear liquid, which is sought by travelers as drink, and solidities first into a pulp eagerly caton by animals, and later into the hardest albumen known, whence its name foory-nut. This again softens in germinating, turning into a milk and pulp, which feeds the young plant until it has grown for a year or more.

were keyboard-instruments more akin to the harp than to the dulcimer. The dulcimer has been known in some form from the earliest historic times. Several attempts were made during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to combine a keyboard with it, perhaps the most important being the pandaleons of Hebenstreit. The chief esthotic motive to these attempts arose from the fact that the keyboard-instruments then known were nearly or entirely incapable of gradation in the loudness of their tone; hence the new instruments, when invented, was called a plane of orte, a interpiano, or a pianoforte, because its main peculiarity was that its tone might be made either loud or soft at the player's will. The earliest manufacture of planofortes of which there is certain record was by Bartolomeo Cristofori of Padua, about 1710. Various improvements have been and are still being made in details, but the essential elements of the mechanism have not been rudically changed. These elements are as follows. (a) The frame or back is a framework of metal, with various cross-bars and truscas so planned as to ofter a stanch resistance to the tension of the strings. This tension in a modern grand planoforte amounts to several tons. To the frame are attached on one side or end the string-plate and on the other the screet-plane, to the former of which one end of the strings is fastened, while in the latter are set the tuning-plas, around which their tension may be adjusted. Frances are sometimes made of wood, but usually of fron preferably cast in a single piece. (b) The strings are steel wires of graduated thickness and length, the larger being made heavier by being wound with copper wire. For each of the oxtrem upper and lower tones only one wire is provided, but for most of the others there are two cr three wires, which are tuned in unison, and placed so that they shall be struck simultaneously by a single hammer. (c) The soundsphoord is a thin plate of selected wood so placed under the strings that it is drawn into sympathetic vibration with them. The sonority and quality of the tones depend much upon its material, form, and stachment. At the side or end next the string-plate there is an opening in the sounding-hoard for the hammers. (d) The section comprises the entire system of levers, hammers, etc., by which the player causes the strings to sound. It includes a keyboard (which see) made up of keys or digitals, each of which works on a pivot near its center. When the front end of a key is depressed, the back end is raised, carrying with it a rod called a jack, the upper end of which propels a felt-tipped hammer against one or more strings with a blow. At the same instant a damper is lifted from the strings so that they can wibrate freely. After the blow is given the hammer falls back against a cheek, while the damper remains lifted until the key is released. Various exceedingly ingenious devices are used to prevent noise, to insure ease, precision, and power, and to provide for extreme rapidity of manipulation. Various mechanical effects are produced by means of pedais, such as the damper of load pedal, which lifts the dampers from all the strings and once, so that all the strings sounded shall continue to sound, and other strings shall be drawn into sympathetic wibration; until the pedal is released; a winter same shall continue to sound, and other strings shall be drawn into sympathetic which holds up all the dampers that happen to be raised when it is pressed down, so that selected tones may be prolonged at will; and a soft peeds, which ether introposes a strip of thin felt between the hammers and the strings or diminishes the distance from which the hammers shall strike the strangs, so that a soft tone shall be produced. It consists of a ground-theme or air called the wist, followed by several variations, generally three or four, the whole concluding with a quick movement called the creasduidh. Pibrochs usually increase in difficulty from the beginning to the cnd, and are profusely ornamented with grace-notes called verblers. They are generally intended to excite a martial spirit. They also often constitute a kind of programmusic, intended to represent the various phases of a hattle—the march, the attack, the condict, the fight, the pursuit, and the lament for the fallen. The names they bear are often derived from historical or legendary eventa, as "The Raid of Kilchrist," attributed to the piper of Macdonald of Glengarry, and supposed to have been composed in 1608. The term is sometimes used figuratively by poets to denote the bagpipe itself.

Though thus a heterogeneous and artificial group, it corresponds in the main with the modern order Picarie, of which it is the prototype. With various modifications, and especially with the exclusion of the Psittset, the term continues in general use by ornithologists as the name of a group of non-passerine nou-raptorial land-birds; but it is so heterogeneous that no disgnostic characters can be assigned, and the tendency now is to drop the term and elevate several of the groups of genera which it formerly covered to ordinal or subordinal rank, under the names Macrochires, Coopea, and Polformsa, or their equivalents. picarian (pī-kā ri-an), a. and n. [NI.., < Picus + -ide.] A large family of scansorial zygodactyl picarian birds, named from the genus Picus, characterised by the habit of picking the wood of trees both to procure food and to construct nesting-places; the woodpeckers. (a) In a broad sense, a family including the piculets and wynecks, which have soft tall-feathers not used in climbing, and divided into Picine, Picus and wyneck. (b) By exclusion of the last two as respectively types of different families, the woodpeckers proper, which have stiff acuminate tall-feathers used in climbing, being pressed against the tree, and forming with the feet a triped of support. The tail consists always of twelve rectrices, but the next to the outer pair are very small and concealed, so that there appear to be only ten. The wing is more or less pointed, with ten primaries, of which the first is short or spurious; the coverts are short, as in passerine birds. The feet are four-toed and sygodactyl (excepting in the genus Picoldes). The arrangement of the flexor tendons of the toes is antiopelmous, the oligiand is tuited, the carotid is single, see are wanting, and the manubrium of the breast-bone is bifurcate. The principal peculiarities are found in the skull, beak, and tongue. The palatal structure is unique and of the type-called by Parker sourcegnathous, and the whole skull is remarkably solid and firm. The beak is ominently fitted, like a gouge or chisel, for boring into wood. In some of the less typleal Picilae this instrument is a little curved, acute, and not ridged on the sides: in most woodpeckers, however, it is perfectly straight, very hard, truncate chisel-wise (perpendicularly) at the end, and beveled and strengthened with ridges on the sides: in most woodpeckers, however, it is perfectly straight, very hard, truncate chisel-wise (perpendicularly) at the end, and beveled and strengthened with ridges on the sides: in most woodpeckers, however, it is perfectly straight, very hard, truncate chisel-wise (perpendicularly) at the end, and beveled and strengthened with ridges on the sides. n., which is in part ult. the source of the verb pick∶ see pick¹, v., pike¹, n.]

1. A pointed in strument of various kinds. (a) A tool used for loosening and breaking up closely compacted soil and rock. It is ordinarily a bar of iron tipped with steel at both ends, about eighteen inches long, sometimes straight but more generally slightly curved, and having an eye in σ and ϵ , pickaxes, σ (sometimes called a pick-mattock) having an adx-like edge on the end opposite the point, and ϵ having its bdge in line with the handle, like a common as: δ , n push-pick, having a crutch-handle δ , which is grasped by the hands, and a step ϵ for the foot; δ , a miners' pick; ϵ , the common pick used in exavation.

the middle to receive a handle or helve. The tips of the pick are usually sharpened to a point by a square taper; sometimes, however, to a chisel-edge. The tapering extermities of the pick possess the property of the wedge, so that this tool is really hammer and wedge in one. Its form allows it also to be advantageously used as a better. The pick is known in England by the names pick, masdrel, sittler, mattock, and hack; the last two, however, belong properly to forms of the pick with only one point and that ending in a chisel-edge. The pick is largely employed by miners, especially by coal-miners. (8) An edged or pointed hammer used in dressing stones. (6) A toothpick. [Colloq.] (4?) A fork.

(e) A four-tined cel-spear with a long handle. [Prov. Rng. 24. A pike or spike; the sharp point fixed in the center of a buckler.

2. A brisk fancy step or caper in dancing, skating, etc.: as, to cut a pigeonwing.

Shaking off straw and furs, wraps and pattens, the la-dies had no sconer swallowed cups of tea than they were whisked into line for the Virginia reel, over against a row of cavaliers arrayed with back-seam coat-buttons coming beneath their shoulder-blades, who cut the pigeon-wing in square-toed pumps. Then what life, what joyous frisk-ing!

pigment (pig'ment), n. [< ME. pigment, spiced wine (see piment), < OF. pigment (also piment), F. pigment, < L. pigmentum, a pigment, < pingere ($\sqrt{pig}$), paint: see picture.] 1. Any substance that is or can be used by painters to invert sales to helicat technically. substance that is or can be used by painters to impart color to bodies; technically, a dry substance, usually in the form of a powder or in lumps so lightly held together as to be easily pulverized, which after it has been mixed with a liquid medium can be applied by painters to surfaces to be colored. Pigment is properly restricted to the dry coloring matter which when mixed with a vehicle becomes a paint; but the two words are commonly used without discrimination. (See paint.) In oll-painting, the pigments are ground or triturated to render them smooth, usually in poppy or nut-oil, since these dry best and do not deaden the colors.

If you will allow me, Pyrophilus, for the avoiding of ambiguity, to employ the word pigments to signify such prepared materials (as cochineal, vermilion, orpiment) as painters, dyers, and other artifocrs make use of to impart or imitate particular colours. Boyle, Works, II. 48.

2. In biol., organic coloring matter; any organized substance whose presence in the tissues of animals and plants colors them. Pigment is the generic or indifferent term, most kinds of pigment having specific names. Coloring matter of one kind or another is almost universal in animals and plants, comparatively few of which are coloriess. Pigments are very generally distributed in the integument and its appendages, as the skin, and especially the fur, feathers, scales, etc., of animals, and the leaves and other soft parts of plants. The dark color of the negro's skin is due to the abundance of pigment in the epidermis. The black appearance of the pupil of the eye is due to the heavy pigmentation of the choroid, and various colors of the iris depend upon specific pigments. Buch coloring matters are often collected in special sees which open and sbut, producing the "shot" or play of color of the chameleon, dolphin, cuttlefish, and other animals. In many low animals and plants the color of the pigment is characteristic of genera, families, or even higher groups, as among infusorians, algals, etc. See cut under cott.

The essential idea in the Bo or dominion over it, as security for the performance of an obligation. The essential idea in the Roman and civil law is the putting of property, whether of a chattel, or land, or territorial jurisdiction (or servants or children, when they are regarded as property), under the hand of the creditor or pledgee as security, so that, although the right of the owner was not extinguished, the creditor or pledgee could enforce his claim without legal proceedings or any effort to gain possession; and this is also the essential idea in posses and also in the strict use of pledge; while hypothee and mortgage imply that the owner retains possession, and that the creditor has only a right of action, or a right to demand possession in the contingencies agreed on.

(b) (1) A sharp-pointed weapon consisting of a long shaft or handle with an fron head. It has been in use from ancient times, but the word dates apparently from the fifteenth century. About that period, and for some time later, it was the arm of a large part of the infantry, and was from 16 to 20 feet long. It continued in use, although reduced in length, throughout the seventeenth century, and was replaced by the bayonet as the latter was improved. It was retained in the British army until a very late date as a mere ensign of rank. (See half-pike and spontom.) The pike has always been the arm of hastily levied and unequipped soldiers; thousands were used in the French revolution. Such pikes have usually a round coulcal head, a mere ferrule of thin iron bent into that form, but long, sharp-pointed, and formidable. The pike of regular warfare had sometimes a round, sometimes a flat or spear-like head.

In the Court there was a Soldier pourtrayed at length with a blacke pike in his hand. Coryat, Crudities, I. 228.

(2) A weapon which replaced for a short time the simple pointed pike; it had an ax-blade on one side and a pointed beak or hook on the other. In this form it was piked; n. False pile, an additional length given to a pile after driving. R. II. Knight.—Gaged piles, large piles placed at regular distances apart, with horizontal beams called rusarers fitted to each side of them by notching, and secured by bolts. They form a guide for the filling-piles, which are driven between the runners, filling up the spaces between them.—Hollow pile, a large wrought or cast-from cylinder sunk in sandy strata by digging away or forcing out the sand from the fuside. Sections of cylinder are added above, as may be necessary, and secured by itanges and bolts.—Hydraulic pile, a pile sunk in sand by means of a water-jet. Two methods are followed. In one, a hollow from pile is set upright in the sand in the position it is to occupy, while a powerful stream of water is forced into the pile and excaps through a hole at the point of the tube, foreing up the sand, so that the tube rapidly sinks. In the other method, solid wooden piles are sunk in the same manner, the jet being delivered at the foot of the pile by means of an iron pipe let down boside the pile and afterward withdrawn. On stopping the water-jet the sand quickly settles around the pile and holds it tirmly in position.—Pneumatic pile. See pneumatic, (See also screened, sheet-pile.)

Pillage and robbery. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 174. 2. Plunder; spoil; that which is taken from another by open force, particularly and chiefly from enemies in war.

Which pillage they with merry march bring home To the tent-royal of their emperor. Shak., Hen. V., 1. 2. 196.

Shak., Hen. V., i. 2. 195.

"Byn. Pillage. Phunder, Booty. Spoil, Prey. These words denote that which is violently got or carriet off; all except prey suggest a considerable amount seised. Pillage also denotes the act; the others only the thing or things taken. Pillage and spoil especially suggest the great loss to the owners, completely stripping or despolling them of their property; plunder suggests the quantity and value of that which is taken: as, loaded with plunder; booty is primarily the spoils of war, but also of a raid or combined action, as of pirates, brigands, or burglars; spoil is the only one of these words that is used in the plural, except, rarely, prey. Prey now seems figurative or archaic when not applied to the objects of pursuit by animals: as, the mouse falls a ready prey to both beasts and birds; hence, when applied to that which is pursued or taken by man, it expresses condemnation of the act.

Knotted pillar. See knotted.—Pillar and breast, a common method of mining coal, in which the breasts are rectangular rooms, usually five or ten times as long as they are broad, and opened on the upper side of the gangway, or main haulage-road, or level driven on the strike of the coal. The breasts are made of various widths, usually from five to twelve yards, according to the character of the roof, but not so wide that the roof will not sustain itself. These breasts or rooms are separated by pillars of coal, broken only by cross-headings where these are needed for ventilation. The pillars are sometimes left so narrow that it is not expected they will permanently support the roof of the mine; in such cases the object of the method is to get as much coal as possible in the shortest time and at the least expense. If more economy of coal is considered desirable, the pillars are left wider, and, after the breasts are entirely worked out, are "robbed"—that is, are cut away until all the coal has been obtained from them which can be removed without too great danger to the miners. This method of mining is also called post and stall, piller and room, scop and room, board and pillar, oct. The pines are evergreens ranging in size from that of a low bush up to a height of 800 feet. Some of them are of the highest economic importance from the timber obtained from them, which, though not of the finest cabinet quality, is very extensively used in all kinds of construction. In this regard the most important species are in Europe, the Scotch pine; in North America, the (Canadian) red pine, the common white pine, the long-leafed pine, the yellow pine of the cast, and that of the west; in India, the Bhutan, chir, and Khasian pines; and in Japan, the matan (Japanese pine). (Scobelow.) The resinous products of some are of great value (see girle? tur, turpentine, resin, abictone, australene; also Aleppo pine, clusterpine, Consicus pine, long-leafed pine, Muyho pine, and stone-pine — all below, and chir); and some species are useful for their edible seeds (see nut-pine). It ranges from British Columbia to Mexico, but is at its best in Oragon and Washington, where it forms large forests, and sometimes exceeds 300 feet in height. It is the most valuable timber-tree of the Pacific region. Its wood is hard, strong, and durable, difficult to work, largely manufactured into lumber, and used for all kinds of construction, for masts and space, railway-ties, etc. Lumbermen distinguish varieties of the wood as red and yellow fir, the red less valuable. The bark is serviceable for tanning.—Oyster Bay pins, Califiver shomboides, a somewhat useful conifer of Taumania.—Pinas-ter-pine, the cluster-pine.—Piton-pins. (c) In America, Pinas-rigida, a moderate tree of stiff habit, found from New Brunswick to Georgia. Its wood is used for fuel, charool, and coarse lumber. Also called turch-pins. There are about 70 species, widely distributed throughout north temperate regions, with a very few extending within the tropics in eastern Asia and Central America. They are tail or sometimes low evergreens bearing ovoid or oblong cones of closely imbricated woody scales, with thin or thickened aper. Every scale bears two winged seeds, the embryo with from three to ten seed-leaves set in a circle. (See cut under cotyledom.) The scales remain tightly set together over the seeds from fertilization till maturity, and after opening and discharging the seeds are long persistent on their axis. The cones vary in size from 2 inches and less in P. edulie, the pinon, to 6 inches in the well-known cones of the white pine, P. Strobus, and reach 18 inches or more in P. Lambertians, the sugar-pine. The United States is particularly rich in pines, boing the home of half the known species. For species and uses, see pine1. 2. One of the tubes of metal or of wood from which the tones of an organ are produced; an organ-pipe. Such pipes are either flue or reed-pipes. The tone is produced in flue-pipes by the fluctuations of a compact focused stream of air impinging upon a sharp edge or lip, and in reed-pipes by the vibration of a metal tongue hung in a stream of air. Metal pipes of either class are usually circular in section, while wooden pipes are usually square or triangular. (a) flue-pipes consist of a long and a food, the division between which is marked by an opening on one side of the pipe, called the manth. The upper and lower edges of the mouth are called lips, and its sides are often shielded by ears. Opposite the lower lip a horizontal shelf, called the language or languid, is inserted so as nearly to separate the pipe into two distinct cavities. Between this shelf and the lower lip is a narrow silt called the law or sind-way, through which the stream of air is directed against the upper lip. The quality of the tone depends upon the general shape of the pipe, and especially upon a delicate adjustment of the language and lips called soleing. The pitch of the tone depends upon the general shape of the pipe, and especially upon a delicate adjustment of the language and lips called soleing. The pitch of the tone depends upon the length of the vibrating column of air within the body. The upper end of the pipe inay be open, or may be closed with a plug; an open pipe gives a tone an octave higher than a stopped pipe of the same length. Tuning is effected by altering the effective length of the air-column in various ways; and the adjustable metal flaps or tongues placed at the top of the pipe for this purpose are called teners. The lower end of the pipe is open for the admission of air from the wind-chest. (b) Reed-pipes consist of a tube or body and a monthylece, the only communication between which is through a short metallic tube called tings or body and a monthylece, the only communication between which is through a short met 2. - Piped key, a key with a hollow barrel which fits upon a pintle contained in the lock. Also pipe-key.

pipe-dance (pip'dans), n. A dance resembling the sword-dance, in which a number of clay to bacco-pipes are used instead of swords.

Sometimes they do the pipe-dance. For this a number of tobacco-pipes, about a dozen, are laid close together on the floor, and the dancer places the toe of his boot between the different pipes, keeping time with the music.

Maykee, London Labour and London Poor, I. 14.

pipe-die (pip'di), n. 1. In a press for molding earthenware pipes, the ring-shaped die which shapes the exterior surface of the pipe. A piece called the core is supported in such manner that one of its extremities protrudes outwardly into. and is held concentrically within, the pipe-die. This forms an annular opening, through which the plastic clay is forced by heavy pressure, to give it the form of a tube. The inside of the socket on the end of the pipe is shaped by what is called a tower die, and the outside of the socket is formed by a device called the ring, which is interposed between the outside die and a finge on the lower die.

2. A female screw or nut of hardened and temperature of the lower die.

2. A female screw or nut of hardened and tempered steel used for cutting male threads on the ends of metal pipes. The threads of the die have grooves cut across them parallel with the aris on which the die rotates. In cutting pipe-threads, these grooves afford clearance for escape of the metal cuttings, which would otherwise accumulate in the threads of the die and prevent a clean, uniform cut.

G. A. Sala. pipe-line (pip'lin), n. A conduit of iron pipe, chiefly laid under ground, through which oil is forced by pumping to transport it from an oil-region to storage-tanks at a general market or raffinery. The method has been put in operation in the region to storage-tanks at a general market or refinery. The method has been put in operation in the United States on a vast scale, as a substitute for other means of transportation, and carried out with all the refinements of modern pumping-machinery, the result being an enormous reduction in the cost of transportation and in the cost of petroleum products to consumers. The conduits are constructed of lap-welded fron pipes, with pumping-stations at intervals of varying lengths, according as the grade is ascending or descending, the average being about 30 miles. The diameters of the pipes are adapted to the needs of the various lines, 6 inches being the size used on most trunk-lines, and two or more pipes lading employed when greater capacity is required. The longest existing trunk-line is that connecting the Pennsylvania oill-region in opposite directions with New York and Chicago. This and other trunk-lines, and lines leading from wells to pumping-stations, etc., make up an aggregate extent of many thousand miles. The pipes are liable to obstruction from deposits of parafin and foreign matters, such accumulations are removed by driving a sort of piston called by the workmen a "go-devil") through the pipes, from station to station, by the pressure of the liquid column behind it.

Pirogues are sometimes large, decked, rigged with sails, and furnished with outriggers. In Louisiana the terms pirogue and cance are used indifferently. See periagua, 2.

A number of officers, with three hundred and twenty soldiers, twenty women, and seventeen children, left New Orleans on the 27th of February, under the command of an officer named Loftus, in ten boats and two percouses.

Gayarri, Hist. Louisians, II. 102.

The earliest improvement upon the cance was the Ptrogue, an invention of the whites. Like the cance, this is hewed out of the solid log; the difference is that the ptrogus has greater width and capacity, and is composed of several pieces of timber—as if the cance was sawed in two equal socitions and a broad fiat piece of timber inserted in the middle, so as to give greater breadth of beam to the vessel. This was probably the identical process by which Europeans, unable to procure planks to build beats, began in the first instance to enlarge cances to suit their purposes.

Pisciculture has been practised from very early ages. It appears to have been in use in ancient Egypt, and was followed in China in early times on a very large scale. It was introduced in Great Britain by Mr. Shaw of Drumianing, in Dumfriesshire, Scatland, in 1857. An important branch of modern pisciculture is the propagation and rearing of young fish in artificial ponds, with the view of introducing fish previously not found in the locality, or of increasing the supply of desirable food-fishes. Salmon- and trout-ova sent from Great Britain have been successfully propagated in Australia and Now Zealand. Of late years America has taken the lead in fish-culture, under the administration of the United States Fish Commission, and infilious of ova and fry have been planted in various rivers.

The s species are natives of western Asia and the Mediterranean region, the Canary Islands, and Mexico.

They are large or small trees, exuding a resin (terebinth or mastic), and bearing alternate evergreen or deciduous leaves, pinnate or of three leafets, and axiliary panteles or racenes of small diocious flowers. See mastic.n., 1, mastic-tree, lentisk, balsam-tree, terubinth, turpentine-tree, chian turpentine under Chian), alk?, alk-gam, pistachionad, and bladder-mul.) Several species yield useful wood, resins, and galls. The galls of a variety of P. Khinjub, of northwestern India, are sold in the Indian bazsars for taming, and are there known as kakra singht.

Pistia (pis'ti-ii), n. [NL. (Linnœus, 1737), ζ (r. πιστός, liquid, ζ πίνειν, drink.] A genus of monocotyledonous floating water-plants of the order Δεακοπ. constituting the tribe Pistinidem.

monocotyledonous floating water-plants of the order Aracer, constituting the tribe Pistioider. It is characterized by the absence of perianth, and the position of the solitary or few staminate flowers on the short free apex of a spadix which is adnate below to the small white spathe, and bear at the base a single obliquely globose one-celled ovary with thick style and cup like sitgma. The only species, P. Stratioke, is common throughout the tropics excepting Australia and the Pacific islands. It consists of a rosette of pulo pen-green rounded and downy leaves. It floats unattached, its tutts of long feathery roots often not reaching the bottom, and increases by runners, often soon covering pends and tanks, keeping the water fresh and cool. It bears the name of tropical duckseed, and in the West Indies of cater-lettuce. pistic† (pis'tik), a. [{ Gr. πιστικός, in the N. A complete pistil consists of three parts, overy, sigh, and signa. The overy is the hollow part at the base which contains the ovules, or bodies destined to become seeds. The style is simply a prolongation of the overy, and may sometimes be entirely wanting. The stigma is a part of the surface of the pistil demided of opidermis, upon which the pollen for fertilising the ovules is received, and through which it acts upon them. The form of the stigma is very various in different plants, being sometimes a mere knob or point at the apex of the style, a line, or double line, or of various shapes. There are usually several pistils, or at least more than one pistil, in each flower; collectively they are termed the gynarcium. who were called pistoleers from its use. The early pistol was fitted with the wheel-lock, which was superseded by the fint-lock, and the latter by the percussion-lock. Pistols with more than one barrel have been in use from the introduction of the weapon, those with two having the barrels sometimes side by side, sometimes one over the other. The stock of the pistol has been made of many forms, the old cavalry pistol having it only slightly curved, so that it was held, when pointed at an object, by the right hand, with the lock upperment, the barrel to the left, the trigger to the right. When accurate aiming was required, as in dueling-pistols, the handle was made much more curved. In mach., a movable piece, generally of a cylindrical form, so fitted as to fill the sectional area of a tube, such sectional area of a tube, such as the barrel of a pump or the cylinder of a steam-engine, and capable of being driven alternately in two directions by pressure on one or the other of its sides. One of its sides is fitted to a rod, called the piston-rod, to which it imparts reciprocatory motion, as in the steam-engine, where the motion given to the piston-rod is communicated to the machinery, or by which, on the other hand, it is itself made to move, as in the pump. Two sorts of pistons are used in pumps—one hollow with a valve, used in the suction-pump, and the other solid, which is employed in the force-pump. The latter is also called a piunyer.

2. In musical wind-instruments of the trumpet family, one of the forms of valve whereby a crook alternately in two directions family, one of the forms of valve whereby a crook is temporarily added to the tube and the pitch is temporarily added to the tube and the pitch of the tones altered. It is operated by depressing a finger-knob, and thus pushing a plunger into a cylinder. The plunger has channels for changing the direction of the sir-column. Pistons have been applied to various instruments, but especially to the cornet, which is therefore called the cornet-a-pistons.

piston-knob (pis'ton-nob), n. Same as picton, 3. piston-packing (pis'ton-pak'ing), n. 1. Any material used to pack or make tight the space between the perimeter of a piston-head and the interior of the cylinder or -barrel in which the interior of the cylinder or -barrel in which it moves. Many different materials have been used for piston-packings, among which are hemp (usually in the form of a braided gasket), either by itself or saturated with tallow or mixtures of various oily or fatty materials, indisrubber or compositions of which indis-rubber is a principal ingredient, leather, metallic alloys, etc. Piston-packings are usually inserted in a growe or depression in the perimeter of the piston-head, and expanded by mechanical compression to make a steam-tight, air-tight, watertight, or gas-tight joint.

2. A mechanical device for packing pistons, in which the overstion depends move more than which the operation depends more upon the construction than upon the fibrous, plastic, or compressible properties of the packing-mateconstruction than upon the fibrous, plastic, or compressible properties of the packing-material... A pump consisting of a pump-cylinder or -barrel in which a reciprocating piston works. It is provided with appliances for moving the piston, as a piston-rod or pumprod, and a hand-lever actuating the pump-rad, or the cross-head of an engine attached to it; an induction-port or -ports covered with valves which permit a fluid to enter the pump-barrel, but prevent its return; and an eduction-port or -ports provided with valves which permit femus of the fluid from the pump-barrel, but prevent its return. These are the essential features of piston-pumps. They usually also have induction- or suction-pipes, and frequently eduction- or discharge-pipes. See pumpl, kitz-pump, force-pump, planger-pump, and section-pump.

piston-alseve (pis'ton-slöv), n. The piston of a trunk-engine, with which the connecting-rod or pitman is directly connected by a pivot. Such a piston has a hollow cylinder (eleeve) cast upon it in order to give it sufficient bearing-length to enable it in itself to perform also the function of the cross-head, the walls of the cylinder then performing the function of the cross-head stides, the pix which directly connected the pix man with the piston taking the place of the ordinary cross-head pin, and no piston-rod being used. This construction enables the engine to be much shortened in the line of its stroke. See trunk-engine.

piston-spring (pis'ton-spring), n. A coil around or inside a piston which, by its tension, acts automatically as packing.

piston-valve (pis'ton-valv), s. A reciprocating valve resembling a working piston, moved in a tubular passage to open or close a port or ports for alternately admitting steam to or exhausting it from the cylinder of an engine.

piston-wheel (pis'ton-hwel), n. 1. In a rotary engine or pump, a disk or wheel carrying at its outer margin one or more pistons.—2 a chain-pump, a wheel carrying an endless chain to which are attached pistons working in a tube or barrel. See rotary engine (under rotary), and chain-pump.

piston-whistle (pis'ton-hwis'l), n. A whistle in which, by shortening or lengthening the vibrating air column through the movement of a brating sir-column through the movement of a piston sliding in the tube (or bell, as it is called in steam-whistles), a sound of varying pitch is emitted. See Modoc whistle, under whistle.

—Byn. 1. Pity, Compassion, Commiscration, Sympathy, Condolence. Pity is the only one of these words that allows even a tinge of contempt; pity and compassion come from one who is felt to be so far superior. Sympathy, on the other hand, puts the sufferer and the one sympathizing with him upon an equality by their follow-feeding. Compassion does not keep so near its derivation; it is deep tenderness of feeling for one who is suffering. Sympathy is equal to compassion in its expression of tenderness. Commiscration is, by derivation, sharing another's miscry; condolence is sharing another's grief. Commiscration may and condolence must stand for the communication to another one's feelings of sorrow for his case. It is some comfort to receive commiscration or condolence; it gives one strength to receive sympathy from a loving heart; it is irksome to need compassion; it galls us to be pitied. Sympathy does not necessarily imply more than kinship of feeling. See also the quotations under condolence.

2. Any epidemic disease of high mortality. The disease known specifically as the plague, or bubo plague, entered Europe from the Levant in the sixth century, and his gored there is scattered localities over a thousand years. It has appeared in various regions (Egypt, Turkey, Persis, etc.) in the mineteenth century; the last occurrence in Europe was in the Volga district, in 1878-9. Typical cases, after a period of incubation of from two to seven days, begin suddenly with prostration, headache, dissinces, and sometimes vomiting and diarrhee; after a few hours or one or two days a chill develops, followed by high fever with noisy delirium, passing into coma; on the second to the fourth day buloes, most frequently inguinal, develop; in non-fatal cases they more frequently suppurate than resolve; there may also be carbuncies, holds, and peteodise; convalescence begins from the sixth to the tenth day. The mortality is extreme, sometimes running as high as 95 per cent. The black-death of the four-teenth century may have been a modified form of this plague; so, too, the Pali plague. Also called the pest, the pestience, plandular plague, Justinian plague.

See lace.—Plaited stitch, one of the stitches of worsted work or Berlin wool work, in which the threads span a considerable distance at each insertion, the result being a sort of herring-bone pattern.—Plaited string work, a kind of fancy work made with small cord, or ordinary string, narrow ribbon, or tape, which is plaited or twisted into simple patterns.—Plaited worms, the Aspidagasteridæ.

platter (platter), n. [< plait + -er1.] One who or that which plaits or braids; especially, an implement for producing plaits of regular size, as in cloth.

plaiting (pla'ting), u. [Verbal n. of plait, v.]

1. The act or process of making plaits or folds, or of interweaving or braiding two or more strands, fibers, etc.

Plairing appears to have been the process first practised; for short fibers, such as grass, rushes, &c., can be used without the aid of spinning by this means.

A. Barlon, Weaving, p. 404.

2. Plaits, folds, or braids taken collectively.-3. In hat-making, the felting or interweaving of the hair to form the body by means of pressure, motion, moisture, and heat. Also called hardening.

plaiting-machine (pla'ting-ma-shen'), n. plaiting-machine (platting-ma-shon'), n. A machine for forming plaits in cloth; a plaiter. In simple forms it is merely a board with a series of needles hinged to one side, the fabric being folded in plaits under the needles in any manner desired, and held in position by the needles till the form has been impressed by a hot fron. Other machines, whether serving as attachments to sewing-machines or working independently, operate by means of reciprocating blades, which tack or push the fabric into plaits, these plaits being fixed by means of hot from or heated cylinders.

plait-work (platt werk), n. Decoration by means of interlacing or interwoven bands, seeming as if plaited together. Compare strupwork.

plakat (plak'at), n. [Siamese name.] fighting-fish.

[= D. G. Dan. Sw. plan, < F. plan (plan), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. plan, < F. plan, a ground-plot of a building (= Sp. plan, plano = Pg. plano = It. piano), < plan, flat, a later form than the vernacular plain, < L. planus, flat, plane: see plain¹, plane¹.] 1. The representation of anything drawn on a plane, as a map or chart; specifically, the representation of a hydding or other structure in hericartal of a building or other structure in horizontal section, as it stands or is intended to stand on the ground, showing its extent, and the division and distribution of its area into apartments, rooms, passages, etc., or its method of construction and the relation of its parts. The raised plan of a building is the same as an elevation. A geometrical plan is one drawn to scale, or one in which the solid and vacant parts are represented in their natural proportions. A perspective plan is one the lines of which follow the raises of perspective, thus showing more distant parts smaller than they are in fact in relation to the nearer parts. The term plan may be applied to the draft or representation of any projected work on paper or on a plane surface: as, the plan of a town or city, or of a harbor or fort. See cuts under comp and canal-lock.

2. Disposition of parts according to a certain design.

Expatiate free o'er all this scene of man, A mighty maze! but not without a plan. Pope, Essay on Man, i. 6.

Man only mars kind Nature's plan,
And turns the flerce pursuit on man.

Scott, Rokeby, iii. 1.

3. A formulated scheme for the accomplishment of some object or the attainment of an end; the various steps which have been thought out and decided upon for the carrying out of some project or operation.

Where there seemed nothing but confusion, he can now iscern the dim outlines of a gigantic plan.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 322.

The very fact of a plan implies a logical procedure.
W. L. Davidson, Mind, XII. 253.

4. A method or process; a way; a custom.

Yor why? because the good old rule
Suffect them, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.
Wordsworth, Rob Boy's Grave.

5. A type of structure: as, man is the highest development of the vertebrate plan; the plan of a mollusk or an insect.—American plan, See American.—Common plan, in biol., an archotype.—Details of a plan. See detail.—European plan. See European.—Raif-breadth plan, in step-building, a plan showing the various lines of one longitudinal half of a ship projected on the horizontal plane. —Hernal plan, in mollusks, that modification of the common plan in which, by disproportionate growth of the postabdomen, the intestine acquires a hemal figure: distinguished from neural plan. —Instalment plan. See instalment. —Hernal plan, in mollusks, that modification of the common plan in which, by disproportionate growth of the abdomen, the intestine acquires a neural flexure: distinguished from hemal plan. —Plan of campaign. (c) A formulated scheme for carrying on a campaign. (c) In Ireland, a system of procedure formed in 1886 and supported by the National League. The officers of the League, acting as trusteys, received the rent of tenants on rack-rented estates; this money, less a certain abatement demanded by the tenants, wasoffered to the landlord; if the latter refused it, it was used for support in cases of eviction. — Working-plan, a draft, drawn to a large scale, supplied to artisans or workmen to work from. —Syn. 1. Iraft, delineation, sketch. — 3, Plan, Scheme, Project, Design, plot. Design may represent the end which a plan, scheme, or project is intended to promote. They all indicate thought given to the general sin and to the details. Scheme is the most likely to represent something speculative or visionary: as, he was full of schemes; project stands next to it in this respect, but project may also be the most definite or concete: as, a project for building a bridge. Plan is the least definite; design and plan may be very indefinite, or have a concrete sense: as, a design or plan of going away: a design or plan of a house. Scheme is often used in a bad sense; design sometimes.

II, n. 1. A geometrical surface such that if any two points in it are joined by a straight line, the line will lie wholly on the surface; a surface such that two of them which have any surface such that two of them which have any three points in common must coincide over their whole extent; hence, a real surface having (approximately) this form. It is thus the simplest of all geometrical surfaces. A plane may also be defined as a surface of the form which is the ideal limit toward which the surfaces of three rigid solids, A, B, C, approximate, if these are ground together in successive pairs, AB, BC, CA, AB, and so on indefinitely. In higher geometry a plane is considered as unlimited; but in elementary geometry a part of such a surface is also called a plane.

It is one of the two fundamental simple machines, the other being the lever. In the figure. AC is the inclined plane, the plane of the plane, and BAC the angle of inclines, the other being the lever. In the figure, AC is the inclined plane is to the weight as the height of the plane to its length, or as CB to CA. This was first proved by Stevinus, as follows. Let the two ends of a chain be joined, and let it be then hung over the inclined plane. Then, the festoon which hangs below AB pulls equally upon the two ends, and consequently the part lying on AC balances the part on BC.— that is, weights proportional to the lengths of those two sides of the triangle balance one another. Hence, the less the height of the plane in proportion to its length, or the less the angle of inclination, the greater the mechanical effect, or the less the height in proportion to the length the less in the same proportion will be the weight on the plane which balances a given weight hanging vertically. The name incision plane is sometimes loosely applied to a short railroad of steep grade, where the cars are drawn up the incline by means of a wire rope moved by a stationary engine at the top of the slope, or where special forms of rail and engine are used to overcome the grade. The inclined plane of Mahanoy, Pennsylvania, is an example of the first, the Mount Washington Railroad, New Hampshire, of the second. Inclined planes have been used to lift canni-bast from one level to another, and more recently, as at Cinchinati and at Hoboken, New Jersey, for lifting street-cars and passengers. —Index of a plane. A tool for paring, smoothing, truing, and finishing woodwork. The essential parts of a plane are a stock or frame of wood or metal, having a smooth coneave, or convex base or sole, and a threat in which is placed a steel cutter called the plane-iron or bit. Various devices are used to keep the bit in position in the stock, the most simple and common being a wedge of wood. Planes are made in a great variety of shapes and sizes, and range from it o' 2 inches in length. Nearly all are distinguished by names having reference to the particular kind of work for which they are designed, as the edge plane, moditing plane, and smoothing plane. Planes are also used for truing soft metal surfaces. Plane-irons are inserted in their stocks at various pitches or angles, according to the duty they are to perform. Common pitch, or 46° from the horizontal line, is used in all bene-planes for soft woods. The pitch is increased with the hardness of the material to be worked. See pitch and plane-stock, and cut it next column.

plane-sailing (plan'sa'ling), n. In nav., the art of determining a ship's place on the supposition that she is moving on a plane, or that the surface of the ocean is plane instead of being surface of the ocean is internal instead of being spherical. This supposition may be adopted for short distances without leading to great errors; and it affords great facilities in calculation, as the place of the ship is found by the solution of a right-angled plane triangle. In plane-sailing the principal terms made use of are the course, distance, departure, and difference of latitude, any two of which being given the others can be found. See planet (plan'et), n. [< ME. planete = D. planete = MHG, planete, G. Sw. Dun. planet, < OF. planete, F. planete = Sp. Pg. planete = It. planete, < LL. planete, rarely planetes, a planet, < der.] 1. A star other than a fixed star; a star revolving in an orbit. The sun was formerly considered as a planet, but is now known to be a fixed star. By planet is ordinarily meant a primary planet of the solar system, or body revolving round the sun in a nearly circular orbit. Of these eight are major planets—being, in their order from the sun, Mercury, Venna, the Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Negtune. There are besides about 400 minor planets known. (See planetod.) The periodic comets are not regarded as planets. A secondary planet is a satellite, or small body revolving round a primary planet: thus, the moon is a secondary planet. planeta (plā-nē'tā), n.; pl. planetæ (-tē). [ML.] 1. Originally, an ample mantle, usually of costly material, similar to the psenula, or chasuble in its earlier or circular form. It was worn by the wealthy, and especially by senators, officials, and nobles, in Rome and other parts of the West during the fifth and sixth centuries.

Ita under surface, which in use is against the work, is called the sole or face; the cutting blade is the fron; the device which holds the iron upon the inclined head is the reage; the opening through which the plane-iron passes is the mosth; a projecting portion at the front end is the korn; and the pushing-handle which projects above the back end is the toat.

Honco—2. A chasuble. The name planets (apparently unknown to the Greek Church) seems to have been especially used during the seventh and eighth centuries. After this the vestment was usually called a casule or chasuble; but planets is still the official term in the Boman Catholic Church. At certain penitunital seasons (Advent, Lent, etc.) the descen and subdescen in cathedrals and some other churches wear a folded planets (planets plicate), except in reading the epistle and gospel.

The planeta was worn by bishops as well as by presby-ers. Encyc. Brit., VI. 461.

plane-table (plān'tā'bl), n. 1. An important instrument of topographical surveying, consist-ing of a drawing-board mounted upon a tripod, and capable of being leveled and turned in aximuth, sometimes also having two horizontal motions of translation. An indispensable accompaniment of the plane-table is the alidade, which is a straight-edge carrying upon a standard a telescope with gross-wires (generally with a telemeter), which telescope is motion in alititude. The alidade generally carries a delicate magnetic needle. A certain number of points having the map is to be drawn, having the trigonometric points laid down upon it, is placed upon the table. The latter is then brought into proper orientation; and the paper upon the station determined graphically by the three-point problem. The plane-table presents some alight difficulties when the scale is to be so large that the board itself appears of considerable size on the map, and especially when irregularly laid out towns are to be surveyed with the last degree of accuracy. On the other hand, the plane-table is of little use in mere reconnaissance. But in most plane-trie (plām'irē), n. [< planetoid, reconstruction, not is varied and in all topographical surveys except those of Great Britain.

orientalis, the oriental plane-tree, or its variety accrifolia, the maple-leafed plane-tree, often regarded as a species. The oriental plane-tree and its variety are found wild from Fersia to Italy, and are common in European parks as ornamental trees. The wood is valued for cabinet-work and turnery. (Also called chinar-tree.) The American plane-trees are better known, where native, as specimers of buttonessed. The ordinary species is P. occidentalis, the largest tree of the Atlantic forests, often from 90 to 129 feet high, found chiefly on betton-lands. It is not seldom planted for shade and ornament, and its reddish-brown wood is used in various ways. Other names are buttonbull and vater-beeck. The plane-tree of California is P. racconosa, a somewhat smaller tree with very white bark. Plane-trees suffer from a discase caused by the attack of a porositic fungus, Glangarium varnisegumen. The entire foliage appears in early summer as if scorched and withered, but later in the season fresh leaves are developed. The trees rarely diefron the offects of the fungus. See Platanus.

planimeter (plā-nim'e-ter), n. [= F. planimeter; < NL. planum, a plane, + ttr. μίτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring a plane area by carrying a tracer round its periphery, and noting the change of reading of a scale. Planimeters are of various constructions; but the most in-teresting is the polar planimeter (see the first figure). This consists of an inner arm OJ, turning about a fixed center O, and an outer arm JP, turning about a joint J, and resting upon a point or tracer P, and upon a wheel W, having its axis coincident with or just below the line JP, and provided with a counting-apparatus, so that the turns and fractions of a turn it makes can be read off. In order to see that the instrument will accurately show the area, consider the second figure, where the tracer is supposed to follow the outline of an infinitesimal parallelogram, $P_1P_2P_3P_4$, so placed that when the tracer moves from P_2 to P_3 and from P_4 to P_1 the wheel moves from W_2 to W_3 and from W_4 to W_1 , both these paths of the wheel being in the direction of its axis, so that it only turns in passing from W_1 to W_2 and from W_3 to W_4 , during which motions the inner arm is stationary. The area of the parallelogram described by the tracer is equal to the base P₁P₂ = W₁W₂ (JP₂ + JW₂), untiliplied by the sittinde, which is evidently equal to W₂W₂, so that the area is W₁W₂ × W₂W₃ × (JP₂ + JW₂). The wheel turns one way in passing from W₂ to W₂, and the opposite way in passing from W₂ to W₂, and the opposite way in passing from W₂ to W₃, and the opposite way in passing from W₄ to W₁. But those two paths are not exactly equal, their difference being plainly W₁W₂ × W₂W₃ + JW₂. The algebraic sum of the rolling multiplied by the constant length JP₂ gives the area. Now, any finite area may be conceived as formed of such infinitesimal parallelograms, and were the peripheries of all these traced out in the direction of the motion of clock-hands, every boundary between two of them would be traced once forward and again backward, so that the final reading of the wheel would be the same as if only the onter boundary of the area were traced. This is illustrated in the third figure. Also called platometer.

3. An herb or other small vegetable growth, in contrast with trees.—4. An individual living being with a material organism, not animal in its nature; a member of the vegetable kingdom; a vegetable, in the widest sense. While the difference between plants and animals in all their higher forms is clearly marked, actence has hitherto been unable to fix upon any one absolutely universal criterion between them. Nothing perhaps is so distinctive of the plant as its power to appropriate and assimilate mineral matter directly, whereas most animals live on the products of previous organization. The plant thus mediates in the scheme of nature between the mineral and the animal world, forming an essential condition of most animal existence. But many plants, including the whole group of Fungi, and the saprophytic, parasitic, and carnivorous sowering plants, live wholly or in part on organic matter, while not all animals are confined to organic nutriment. See animal and Provints. For the fundamental classification of plants, see Craptogassis and Phanerogassis. 3. An herb or other small vegetable growth, in Plantagines (planta-jin'é-ë), n. pl. [NL. (Ventenat, 1794), (Plantagine) + -ex.] The plantain family, an anomalous order of gamopetalous plants, little related to any other, characterized by the scarious corolla with alternate stamens; sepals, petals, and stamens each usually four; and the small en-tire two-celled pod, usually circumscissile. It includes 3 genera and over 200 species, nearly all of which belong to the typical genus Plantage, the other genera, Baugueria and Litterela, being both monotypic.

Plantage (plan-tā'gō), n. [Nl. (Tournefort, 1700), < 1. plantage, plantain: see plantain!] A genus of plants, type of the order Plantagince, distinguished by the peltate seeds, two-celled over 20 species, known as plantain or ribuort, and found everywhere, from sretic to tropical regions, in wet or dry ground, but most common in temperate elimates. They are amust or perennial berbs, almost stemless, bearing rosettes of spreading leaves, which are characteristically broad, entire, five to seven-nerved, with dilated-petiolo base. The small flowers are usually crowded in a long spike, cross-fertilized by the earlier maturity of the pistlis. Many species are dimorphous, or include perfect seed-hearing plants of two kinds, one form having long stancess and short styles, the other the opposite. Most of the American species are introduced weeds (for which see plantain!, kempl., hen-plant, and veu-bread, and, for P. lanceolata, ribneari, rib grass, jackstram, and cocks). P. media, the hoary plantain, lamb's-tongue, or fireweed of English pastures, is a pest on account of its stifling growing crops by its broad flat leaves, close-pressed to the ground; and the common P. major is sometimes similarly injurious in America. P. Coronopus is a peculiar plant of the British sea-cliffs, called star-qf-the-earth from its divided radiating leaves, also herb-icy, backs-horn, and harthoru-plantain. For other species, see fleavert, 2, and topoghul-seed. See cut under plantain), n. n. [Formerly also plantan; COF. plantan, plane-tree, = Sp. plintano, also pli-tano, plantain, plane-tree: see planes.] A tropical plant, Musa paradisiaca, or its fruit. The plantain closely resembles the banana, and is in fact often regarded as a variety of it. It is distinguished to the eye by purple spots on the atem, and by its longer fruit. The plantain-fruit is commonly exten cooked before fully mature, while the banana is mostly exten fresh when ripe. The pulp is dried and pulverized to make meal. The fresh fruit is comparable chemically with the potata, the meal with rice. The plantain, together with the banana, supplies the chief food of millions in the tropics. Though less nutritions than wheat or potatoes, it is produced in vastly larger quantities from the same area, and with far less effort. Sometimes called Adam's apple, from the fancy that this was the forbidden fruit of the Garden of Eden; the specific name refers to the same fancy. See Musz and banana.

True protoplasm; bioplasm. See the quotation, and germ-plasma.

Physiologists have come to use the word "protoplasm" for one of the chemical substances of which Schultze's protoplasm is a structural mixture—namely, that highest point in the chemical elaboration of the molecule which is attached within the protoplasm, and up to which some of the chemical bodies present are tending, whilst others are degradation products resulting from a downward metamorphosis of portions of it. This intangible, unstable, all-pervading element of the protoplasm cannot at present be identified with any visibly separate part of the cell-substance. ... This "critical" substance, sometimes called "true protoplasm," should assuredly be recognized by a distinct name "plasmojen."

plate-matter (plat'mat'er), n. Type cast in a number of stereotype plates for insortion in different newspapers, costing them much less than would have to be raid for earthing. than would have to be paid for setting

To-day one of these plate-matter manufacturing firms has branch offices and foundries in New York, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, Minneapolis, and San Francisco, maintaining a corps of editors and employing a large force of compositors and stereotypers at each point. It furnishes matter for almost every department of a newspaper except oditorial articles and local news.

plate-metal (plūt'met'al), n. A plate of metal produced in the process of refining pig-iron as preparatory to its being puddled in the reverberatory furnace, according to the method followed in Yorkshire for the production of a high class of iron. Such plates are grooved on the bottom and have been cooled rapidly, so as to be easily hocken in pieces. Also called line-metal, solids metal, or simply metal, plate-mill (plāt'mil), n. A mill for rolling metal plates. It usually has long rolls, necessitated by the width of the plates, and the rolls are made very heavy and strong in order to prevent springing and consequent greater thickness of the plates in the middle than at the sides. lowed in Yorkshire for the production of a high

Platen (plat'en), n. [Also platin, platine; F. platine, a plate, lock-plate, pillar-plate, scutcheon, plate of a printing-press, covering-plate, etc., plat, flat: see plats and plate.] In printing, the flat part of a press which comes down upon the form, and by which the impresplaten? (plat'en), n. [Appur. a reduced form and special use of platinum.] An alloy used in making buttons, composed of eight parts of copper and five parts of zinc.

plate-paper (plat'pā'per), n. 1. Paper to which a high gloss is imparted on both sides by packing each sheet between smooth plates of copper or zinc, and subjecting a pile of the sheets so or zinc, and subjecting a pile of the sheets so packed to heavy pressure in a rolling-press. Supercalendering (which see) has entirely superseded this process.—2. A heavy, spongy paper used for taking impressions from engraved plates.- Hard plate-paper, soft plate-paper. See paper. plate-piece (plāt'pēs), n. The lower or under half of the fore quarter of beef, used for corn-ing. Also called rattle-ran.

plate-powder (plat'pou'der), n. A polishingpowder for silverware. One kind, called jevelers' rouge, is prepared by mixing solutions of soda and sulphate of fron, and washing, drying, and calcining the precipitated oxid of fron in shallow vessels until it assumes a deep reddish-brown color. Compounds of rouge and prepared chalk, or of oxid of tin and rose-pink, are also termed plate-process.

plate-press (plat'pres), s. A press for printing from engraved plates of steel or copper.

plate-printer: (plat'prin'ter), s. A workman who produces impressions from engraved copper or steel plates, as distinguished from one who prints from types or from stone.

plate-printing (plat'prin'ting), . The act or process of printing from an engraved plate.

plater (pla'ter), . 1. One engaged in the manufacture of metallic plates, or in their application in the arts and manufactures.

When being bent, the plate is lifted by a number of men, under the direction of the plates in charge, who hold the plate in the necessary position for obtaining the re-quired curvature and twist. Theorie, Naval Arch, § 296. 2. A machine for calendering paper by means of heavy pressure between smooth plates of metal.—3. One who plates or coats articles with gold or silver: generally in composition:
as, silver-plater, gold-plater, nickel-plater.—4.
A horse that competes for a plate. Lever.
plate-rack (plāt'rak), s. 1. An open frame for holding plates and dishes; specifically, a frame in which dishes can be placed in a vertical position to dry after they have been washed.

—2. Any arrangement, other than simple shelves, for holding plates in any number, as the inclosed boxes, etc., in the pantries of a ship.—3. A grooved frame for receiving photo-ship.—3. A grooved frame for receiving photographic plates while wet, and holding them diagonally on edge to drain; a negative-rack.

plate-rail (plāt'rāl), n. In railway engin., a flat rail. E. H. Knight.

plate-railway (plāt'rāl'wā), n. A tramway in which the wheel-tracks are flat plates. [Eng.]

plateresco (plat-e-res'kō), a. [Sp.] Same as plateresque (plat-e-resk'), a. [< Sp. plateres-co, < plata, silver: see plate.] Resembling silverwork: noting a certain class of architectural enrichments. Ford.

enrichments. Ford.

plate-roller (plāt'rō'ler), n. A smooth roller for making plate- or sheet-iron.

plate-shears (plāt'shērz), n. sing. and pl. A machine for cutting or shearing plate- or sheet-metal, such as boiler-plate.

Platessa (plā-tes ä), n. [NL., < L. platessa, the plaice: see plaice.] A genus of flatfishes of the family Pleuronectides, having as its type Pleuronectes platessa: same as Pleuronectes in a strict sense. See cuts under plaice and asymmetru.

platesiform (plates'i-fôrm), a. [(L. platessa, the plaice, + forma, form.] In ichth., resembling the plaice in form or structure; related to plate-tracery (plat'tra'ser-i), n. In medieval arch., a form of tracery in which the openings are cut or pierced in slabs of stone, as distinguished from ordinary tracery, which is con-structed of assembled blocks. This form appeared early in the transition from the round-arched to the point-

d style, and was often employed in subsequent periods in places where stone of the necessary formation and toughness was available. It was particularly esteemed in Italy, where the excellent building-marbles, in addition to their mechanical itness, supplied a medium adapted for delicacy of outline and profile, and lending itself to high decorative quality in such tracery.

platetrope (plat'e-trop), n. [(Gr. πλατύς, flat. + τρέπειν, turn.] A part symmetrically related to another on the opposite side of the a lateral homologue; a fellow of the opposite side. Wilder.

platetropy (plat'e-trō-pi), n. [< platetrope + -y3.] The state or condition of being laterally -y².] The state or condition of being laterally homologous; bilaterality; bilateral symmetry; reversed repetition of parts or organs on each side of the meson.

plate-vise (plat'vis), s. In photog., a frame for holding a plate firmly in certain processes, particularly for cleaning or polishing the glass. It consists essentially of two wooden jaws or sides, grooved to receive the plate, and adjustable by means of a screw.

plate-warmer (plat'war'mer), n. 1. A case with shelves or any other device in which plates are held before a fire, over a hot-air register, etc., to be warmed.—2. A hollow metallic tray, of the size and form of a plate, filled with hot water and placed at table beneath a dinner-plate to keep it warm.

plate-wheel (plat'hwel), s. A wheel without arms or spokes; a wheel in which the rim and nave are connected by a plate or web.—Open plate-wheel, a form of cast-iron wheel having large openings in the web between the arms, hub, and rim. It is used for street-cars, etc.

used for street-care, etc.

Apelles. None in hand, if it like your majestle: but I am devising a platforme in my head.

Lyly, Alexander and Campaspe, v. 4.

And now there rests no other shift but this, To gather our soldiers, scatter'd and dispersed, And lay new platforms to endange them. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 77.

A sudden plotform comes into my mind, And this it is, Grim, The Collier of Croydon, ii.

3t. Situation; position.

With your instrument for trying of distances, observe the platforms of the place. Haktupt's Voyages, I. 430.

4. A raisod level place; a terrace.

Ham. But where was this?

Mar. My lord, upon the platfurm where we watch'd.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 213.

The buildings we now find on the platform at Persepolis may have been dedicated to somewhat different purposes than were those of Nineveh.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 189.

5. A raised frame or structure with a level surface. Specifically—(a) A raised structure in a hall or meeting-place for the use of those who are to speak; a rostrum or stage from which a speaker may conveniently address his audience. (b) A raised walk along the track at a railway-station for landing passengers and freight. (c) The place where guns are mounted on a fortress or battery.

The Captain commanded them to cast anchor before a certain town called Oris, which had a plotform or fort with ordnance to defend it.

Kny. Stratagem (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 605).

(d) Naut., the orlop. (e) In a glass-furnace, a bench on which the pots are placed. E. H. Knight. (f) A projecting floor or landing at the end of a railroad-our or street-ear, aerving as a means of ingress and egrees.

Specifically—6. A systematic scheme or body of principles, especially of religious or political principles, expressly adopted as a policy or basis of action; a syllabus, program, or scheme of principles or doctrines adopted as a basis of action, policy, or belief; specifically, in U. S. politics, a statement of political principles and of the course to be adopted with regard to certain important questions of policy, issued by the representatives of a political party assembled in convention to nominate candidates for an election: as, the Genevan platform; a political platform; the Democratic platform.

The wisdom of a lawmaker consisteth not only in a plat-form of justice, but in the application thereof. Bacon Advancement of Learning, il. 255.

Every little society pretending to that venerable name [the church] did the very thing they had complained of: imposed the platform of their doctrine, discipline, and worship as divine; and were for rooting out all that opposed or did not comply with it. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiii.

The Whigs, whether on the Lexington platform or some other non-committal platform, will be and must be at once known as the party that opposed their country in her just and generous war. Resolutions of the Democratic National Convention, May 30, [1844, quoted in New York Herald, May 6, 1848.

Conversation in society is found to be on a platform so low as to exclude science, the saint, and the poet.

Cambridge platform, Saybrook platform, declara-tions of principles respecting church government and doc-trine adopted by church synods held respectively at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1648, and Saybrook, Connecticut, in 1708. They substantially agree with each other and with the principles still maintained by Congregationalists. See comprepationalism.—Feeding-platform, a platform, generally about two feet by four, placed in the initialist of a trent-pand, a few inches above the bottom: used by table culturists. If the food is thrown over this platform, all not taken before it reaches the bottom will fall upon it, and, as it can more easily be cleaned than the bottom of the pend, there is less liability of fouling the water. The fish will also take food better from a clean than from a muddy bottom. It serves incidentally, too, as a cover for the young fish.

platformist (plat'fôrm:st), n. [< platform + -ist.] A public speaker or lecturer. [Colloq.] platform-scale (plat'fôrm-skäl), n. A weighing-machine or balance with a flat scale or platform for the support of the object to be platform for the support of the object to be weighed. The designation is applied especially to a weighing-machine in which the flat scale is piaced near to or on a level with a table, counter, floor, or the ground, for the convenient reception of heavy bodies and to save lifting, and is connected with the scale-beam by a system of compound levers and links. Either sliding or detachable counterpoising weights, or both, are used on the beam, which, when sliding weights are used, is graduated to indicate weights and fractions of the unit of weight.

platform-spring (plat/form-spring), v. In a vehicle, a compound spring consisting of a rec-vehicle, a compound spring consisting of a rectangular arrangement of four arched springs, each made up of long, thin, curved steel plates of regularly diminishing lengths bolted togeof regularly diminishing lengths botted together. The extremities of the four springs are united at the corners of the rectangle by links or stirrups, two of the springs usually bowing upward and two downward. The name has also been applied to a similar mechanism of three springs arranged as on three sides of a rectangle. plat-full (plat-ful'), a. [ME. platful; < plat* + full.] Choke-full.

platiniridium (plat'in-i-rid'i-um), n. [NL., < platin(um) + -iridium.] An alloy of platinum and iridium, occurring in isometric crystals and crystallino grains together with native platinum.

platinization (plat"i-ni-zā'shon), n. The pro-

platinize (plat'i-niz), v. t.; pret. and pp. platinized, ppr. platinizing. [< platin(um) + -ize.]
To coat with platinum in a fine state of division: as, to platinize the negative plate (silvision: as, to platinize the negative plate (silver) of a Simee's battery. Silver is platinized by dipping it or washing it in a solution of platinum chlorid, and then heating it in a closed vessel till the sait decomposes. The negative plates of traphart's potassium-inchromate cell—which consist each of a copper plate having one face and its edges covered with platinum foll soldered to the copper, and its other face covered with lead—have their platinum sides platinized by a deposit of metallic platinum, obtained by decomposition of platinum chlorid with the sid of a galvanic current, the lead being temporarily covered with an achi-proof varnish or coment. Also spelled platinise.—Platinized glass. See plazes.

platinochlorid (plat'i-nō-klō'rid), n. [< platiplatinochlorid (plat'i-nō-klō'rid), n. [< platiplatinochlorid.] A double chlorid containing platinum: as, potassium platinochlorid.—Ethylene platinochlorid. See sthulene.

platinode (plat'i-nōd), n. [< NL. platinum, platinum, + (ir. ὁδώς, way (see cathode).] The negative or non-oxidizable plate of a voltaic cell, which often consists of a sheet of platinum, as in the Grove cell.

When exposed to the light under a negative and subsequently inserted in a hot solution of potassic exalate, the metal is reduced in proportion to the action of the light. The picture is then finished by simply washing in slightly activated water. Some patents of platinum processes, as that of Pixsighelli, simplify greatly the operations of development.

An important metal, introduced into Europe about the middle of the eighteenth century from South America. It does eigniteonth century from South America. It does not occur as an ore, but alloyed with other metals, especially with rhodium, osmium, iridium, and palladium, all of which, together with iron, copper, and gold, are almost always present in it in small quantity in what is called its native state. Platinum is surpassed in ductility only by gold and silver, and in mallcability only by those metals and copper. It is easily rolled into sheets or drawn into wire. Its specific gravity is 21.5, which is higher than that of any other known substance except osmium and iridium. It is not oxidised in the air at any temperature, and is not attacked by any of the simple acids. It is infusible in the strongest heat of a hiast-furnace, but can be melted in the fiame of the oxyhydrogen blowpipe or by means of the electric current. It is a rare metal, and the regions which supply it are few. Most of the platinum of commerce comes from the Urals, South America, and Borneo. It is used chiefly in chemical manufacture and analysis, where its resistance to heat and acids is of special value, and in electrical work. It was used for coinage in Russia from 1828 to 1845.—Platinum chlorid. Same as chloroplatinic acid (which see, under chloroplatinic).—Platinum luster. See luster?

platinum-black (plat'i-num-blak'), n. A black dull powder consisting of very finely divided metallic platinum. It was first obtained by E. Davy, and considered to be a nitrite of platinum-black was recognized by Liebig as metallic, and prepared by him by warning a solution of platinum chlorid in potash with alcohol. According to Liebig, platinum-black absorbs more than 800 times its volume of oxygen. It can be prepared in a variety of ways, and is used in organic chemistry as an oxiditing agent.

Pertaining to Plato (about 427-347 B. C.), or to his doctrines. Reference to the school of Plato and to his followers is more usually expressed by the adjective Platonistic. Plato wrote in dislogues, which are equally admirable from a literary and from a philosophical point of view. He held that the object of philosophy is beauty; that without a deep sense of ignorance no man can philosophise; that indegments of common sense are open to doubt; that the senses may err, and at best can afford only likelihood (cisas's); that experience (δοξα), built out of perceptions, though safer, does not know the reasons of phenomena; and that man is the measure of things, not in his experience of particular facts, as Protagoras would have it, but his in the more of particular facts, as Protagoras would have it, but his in his knowledge of reasons, which alone is emobiling. Philosophy according to Plato has three branches—discotion, proceeds by definition and division. Division should be by dichotomy. He holds strongly to the truth of cognition; the process of mind and the process of nature are one. Neither the Elestic doctrine that all is One, and the Many mere illusion, nor the Heraclitan doctrine that there is only a fluid manifold without unity, is the truth; there is a mixed being (μεντη ούσια); being has an eternal and an evanescent element, and only a compound of these can be an object of science. The One in the Many is the Idea, the active force prescribing regularity (as we should say, the law of nature), which in supercelestial place subsists while individual cases arise and perish. The ideas make up an organism, or living system (coo). They are themselves regulated by an idea of a teleological character, the Good, or ultimate purpose of all things down with Reason, the true Being Goree o), the One. King of heaven and earth, which, immutable, draws all things toward itself. This Reason is God, who is related to the ideas as a poet to the ideas he has created and intends to embody. That, other element which in the actual condition of things in this world has not yet been ollminated so as to leave pure Reason is extended quantity (μεγρα και μέγρα) or body (σωμα), nearly Artistolle's matter (ψ/η). This is the secondary principle (συσεινα) of the universe. God, the father, implants in second of the cool in space, the unother, and without his further interventio Platyhelmintha, Platyhelminthes (plat'i-hel-min'thii, -thez), n. pl. [NL., ζ Gr. πλατίς, broad, flat, + έλμυς (έλμυθ-), a worm: see helminth.] A superordinal or other high group of worms, variously named and rated, includ-ing forms more or less flattened, usually ovate, and indistinctly segmented; the flatworms, or cestoids, trematoids, and turbellarians, toge-ther contrasted with the roundworms or necostoids, trematoids, and turbellarians, together contrasted with the roundworms or nomathelminths. In some of the older arrangements, under the name Platyelmia, they were divided into the non-parasitic order Turbellaria and the two parasitic orders Teniada and Trematoda. In another classification the platyhelminths are a prime division of Vermes, divided into Turbellarian (habdococlous and dendrocacions turbellarians), Nomertina (rhynchococlous turbellarians), Trematoda, and Castuda. In Lankester's latest arrangement they are called Platyhelmia, and are divided into two branches, (Vilata and Cotylophora. The former is the order Turbellarian in a broad sonse, here divided into three classes, Ithabdocala, Dendrocala, and Nomertina (or Rhynchococla). The Cotylophora are divided into three classes, Trematoidea, Cestudaa, and Hirudinea, the two former of these, each with numerous orders corresponding in a general way with the families of other authors. The Mescare of Van Beneden (see Diopensida) are regarded as probably classable with the Ciliata. This arrangement is peculiar in bringing the leeches and Diopensida under this head. Otherwise it rusembles its predecessors. The many arrangements of the flatworms differ more in nomenclature and taxonomic rating than in actual significance. Also Plathelmintha, Plathelminthes.

ESyn. 1. Pleasant, Pleasing, Agreedle, Congenial, gratifying, acceptable, welcome. Pleasing is the strongest, and agreeable the weakest of the first four words. Pleasant may be, and generally is, applied to things in the concrete: as, pleasant weather. Pleasing applies generally to things not physical: as, a pleasant face: a pleasing aspect, variety. Pleasant suggests the effect produced, pleasing the power of producing it; hence we may say a pleasant or a pleasing variety. Pleasing must be objective, pleasant may be subjective: as, he was in a pleasant moud. Agreeable and conjenial are used of social qualities and relations, but the latter goes deeper, expressing a natural suitableness, on the part of a person or thing, to the tastes, habits, temperament, or passing mood of the person concerned.

It was worth while to hear the creaking and hollow tones of the old lady, and the pleasant voice of Phobe, mingling in one twisted thread of talk.

plenty.] The lower order of citizens in ancient Rome; the plebeians; hence, in general, the populace. The members of this order were originally of pure Latin blood, but were not among the founders of Rome; they were recruited from the ranks of the clients and of the Latin peoples who had been amesced by Rome; while citizens, they did not figure in the three tribes or in the curie and gentes of the patricians, and were thus excluded from the comitia, the senate, and all public, civil, and religious offices. They had all the duties and burdens of citizens with groatly restricted privileges. After the establishment of the republic there took place a long struggle between the two orders. The plebeians secured the institution of the tribunate, various reforms, and an increased share in the government; their efforts culminated when, by the Lichian laws (about 367 B. C.), they secured one of the two consuladips. The offices of dictator, censor, and pretor were soon opened to them, and finally, by the Ogulnian law (800 B. C.), the sacred colleges. The strice practically ended by the final confirmation of the extended plebiscitum, about 280 R. C. (See plebiscitum.) Under the kings and the republic a plebeian could be raised to patrician families or individuals sometimes went over to the plebeian order, for various reasons.

pled (pled). An occasional (less correct) preterit and past participle of plead.

pledge (plej), n. [< ME. plegge, < OF. plege, pleige, plaige, ploige, ploige, ploige, plaige, ploige, surety, bail (person or thing), prob. < LL. *præbium, found only in ML. forms reflecting the Rom., plivium, pluvium, plegium, neut., a pledge, surety, plivius, plegius, m., one who gives a pledge, surety (cf. L. præbrum, in pl. præbra, an amulet), < L. præbere, profler, offer, give, grant, afford (præbere fidem, give promise or security): see probeud, and cf. plovin, from the same source. Hence pledge, v.] 1. In law:

(at) A person who goes surety or gives bail for another; especially, a surety whom early English law required of a plaintiff on bringing an action. After a time "John Doe" and "Eichard Roe" did duty as such pledges. (b) A bailment of personal property as a security for some debt or engagement. Story, J. It differs from a chattel mortgage in three essential characteristics: (1) it may be constituted without any contract in writing, merely by delivery of the thing pledged; (2) it requires a delivery of the thing pledged; (3) it requires a delivery of the thing pledged; (3) it requires a delivery of the thing pledged; (4) it requires a delivery of the thing pledged; (5) it does not generally pass the title to the thing pledged, but gives only a lien to the creditor; and the creditor; (3) it does not generally pass the title to the thing pledged; (6) the title, while a pledge is a more lien without a transfer of title, does not always hold good; for in most cases a pledge of choses in action can be made effectual only by a transfer of title, does not always hold good; for in most cases a pledge of choses in action can be made effectual only by a transfer of title thing pawned or delivered as security; a pawn.

—2. Anything given or considered as security for the performance of an act; a guaranty. Thus, or the performance of all act; a guaranty. Thus, a man gives his word or makes a promise to another, which is received as a piedge for fulfilment; a candidate for parliamentary honors gives promises or piedges to support certain measures; the mutual affection of husband and wife is a piedge for the fathful performance of the marriage covenant; mutual interest is the best piedge for the performance of treaties.

Him lite answord th' angry Elfin knight, . . . But throw his gauntlet, as a sucred pledge, His cause in combat the next day to try.

Spenser, F. Q., I. iv. 43.

Pleiad (ph'ud), n.; pl. Plenads, Pleiades (-adz, -a-dôz). [ζ L. Pleïas, Pleias (-ad-), ζ Gr. Π2μάς, Π2κάς (-ad-), pl. Π2κάνεν, one of the Pleiads or Soven Stars, traditionally so called as indicationally. ing by their rising the time of safe navigation; $\langle \pi \lambda uv \rangle$, sail.] One of a close group of small stars in the constellation Taurus, very conspicuous on winter evenings, about twenty-four degrees north of the equator, and coming four degrees north of the equator, and coming to the meridian at midnight in the middle of November. For some unknown reason, there were anciently said to be seven Pichads, although only six were conspicuous then as now; hence the suggestion of a lost Pichad. In mythology the Pichads were said to be the daughters of Atlas and Pichone, and were named Aleyone, Merope, Celsane, Ricetra, Sterope or Asterope, Taygeta, and Maia. These names, with those of the parents, have been applied by modern astronomers since Ricelolo (A. D. 1635) to the principal stars of the group. Four of the brightest stars are at the corners of a trapezoid, with one in the base near the star at the northern angle, and one outside the trapezoid, like a handle to a dipper. Aleyone, the brightest of the group, is a greenish star, of magnitude 3.0, at the east end of the base of the trapezoid, it is a Tauri. Electra is a very white star, of magnitude 3.8, at the westermnost corner of the trapezoid, on the short side opposite the base. Taygeta is a yellowish star, of magnitude 4.2, at the southernmost corner of the trapezoid by a faint nebula, discovered by Tempel many years ago, and visible with a telescope of moderate dimensions. But photographs show that the cluster is also full of invisible wisps and filaments of nebulosity, which are for the most part attached to the larger stars. Maia is a yellowish star, of magnitude 4.0, on the base of the trapezoid, close to the northern angle, but not in it. Asterope is a double star, of magnitude 4.0, on the base of the trapezoid, else to the northern angle, but not in it. Asterope is a double star, of magnitude 5.7, not very complemous, forming an equilateral triangle with Taygeta and Maia, and tying outside of the trapezoid. Colseno is a star of magnitude 5.2, half-way between Electra and Taygeta, just a yellowish star, of magnitude 5.1, a little north of Atlas.

Horn of plenty. See korn. - Syn. Plenty, Abundance, Exuberance, Profusion. These words are in the order of strength. Plenty is a full supply, all that can possibly be needed. Abundance is a great plenty, as much as can be wanted or more. Exuberance is an overflowing plenty, an abundance that bursts out with fullness: as, the exuberance of the harvest. Profusion is a plenty that is poured or scattered abroad; profusion naturally applies to a large number of units: as, a plenty of food: a profusion of things to cat. Exuberance and profusion may mean an amount that needs to be restrained or reduced. See ample.

Enough is a plenty. Old proverb. All they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her mark xii. 44.

Plesiosaurus. | An order of extinct marine Reptilia, having the limbs fitted for swimming, the body fish-like, the neck long, and the head quite small. The fore and hind limbs both constitute flippers or paddles like those of cotacean mammals, having numerous phalanges inclosed in a common integrament like a fin. The pectoral arch is complete, with triradiate scapular and large coracold and clavicular clements, and the pelvis is large, with separate film, ischium, and publs. There is no sternum, nor are there any sternal ribs, but floating abdominal ribs are present. The skull has a fixed quadrate bone, one postorbital bar, and no free paroccipital; the vertebre are amplications, with neurocentral sutures, and only two of them compose a accrum. The ribs are one-headed. The cychell has no scierotic ring of bones, and the teeth are socketed in a single row in both jawa. The order contains many genera of gigantic fish-like saurians from the Trias, Lins, and Chalk, whose affinities are with the chelonians, notwithstanding the wide difference in form. The order is also called Sauropterygia, but Plesionauria is its prior and proper name. See out under Plesionauria is

3. In compar. anat., the lateral portion of one of the rings composing the integument of an arthropod or articulate animal, lying between the tergum and sternum, and in insects and crustaceans consisting of two pieces, the epicrustaceans consisting of two pieces, the epimeron and episternum. In descriptive entomology the term is generally restricted to the side of the thorax, as in Diptera.—Cavity of the pleura, the space between the parietal and pulmonary layers of the pleura. In the normal state these layers are in contact. See cut under thorax.—Parietal pleura. (a) Same as pieura costalia. (b) All the paris of the pleura except the pulmonary portion.—Pericardial pleura. See pericardial.—Fleura costalia, the costal part of the pleura, lining the walls of the thorax.—Fleura mediastimalis, that part of the pleura which enters into the formation of the mediastimum.—Fleura pericardiaca. Same as pericardial pleura.—Fleura phrenica, that part of the pleura which invests the upper surface of the disphragm; the disphragmatic pleura.—Fleura pulmonalis, the pulmonary or visceral part of the pleura, investing the lunga.—Visceral pleura, the pleura pulmonalis.

pleura?, n. Plural of pleuron.

pleuracanth (plö'ra-kanth), a. and n. [{ NL. Pleuracanthus.] Same as pleuracanthoid.

Pleuracanthids (plo-ra-kan'thi-dē), s. pl. [NL., < Pleuracanthus + -ids.] A family of fishes of the order Xenacanthini, typided by the dishes of the order Xenacanthini, typified by the genus Plouracanthins. The body was moderately long; the head roundish; the mouth terminal and well slit; the dorsal double, the first short, armed with an anterior spine, and mostly above the head, the second extending from the first to the candal fin; the anals were double, and the candal was long and diphyceroal; the pectorals had a biserial arrangement of cartilaginous rays, and the ventrals were shark-like; the teeth had two divergent comes and an intermediate denticle. The species lived during the Carboniferous and Fermian periods.

Pleuracanthini (plö"ra-kan-thi"ni), n. pl. [NL., < Pleuracanthes + -ini.] An order of fishes otherwise called Xenacanthini and Ichthyotomi. See Xenacanthini.

See Xmasanthini.

pleuracanthoid (plö-ra-kan'thoid), a. and n. I. a. Of or resembling the Pleuracanthides.
II. n. A member of the family Pleuracanthide

Also pleuracanth.

Pleuracanthus (plö-ra-kan'thus), n. (Agassiz, 1837), ζ Gr. πλευρόν, a rib, + ἀκ spine.] A remarkable extinct genus of fishes, typical of the family Pleuracanthidæ.

pleural¹ (plö'ral), a. [< pleura¹ + -al.] Of or pertaining to a pleura or the pleuræ: as, the pleural investment of the lungs; the pleural cavity; pleural effusion or adhesions. Also pleuric. pleural² (plö'ral), a. [\(\)pleuron + -al. \] 1. Pertaining to a rib or a pleuron, or to the ribs or the pleura collectively; costal; situated on the side of the thorax or chest.—2. Lateral, in general; situated on the side of the body: correlated with dorsal, ventral, etc.—3. In arthropods, portaining to an arthropleurs or pleurite: ap-plied to the lateral limb-bearing section of an arthromore, between the sternite and the tergite. See cuts under Brachyura and Trilobita. -4. Especially, in entom., lateral and thoracie: as, a ploural scierite; a pleural segment of a thoracic somite.—Pleural facet of the movable pleura of a crustaceau, the anterior part of a pleuron which is overlapped by the preceding pleuron in flexion of the budy.—Pleural spine, a spine connected with a pleuroid. G.

pleuralgia (plo-ral'ji-a), n. [NL., < Gr. πλευρά, the side, + ἀλγως, pain.] Pain in the pleura or the side, + αλγος, pain.] Pain in the pieura or side; pleuradynia.

pleuralgic (plö-ral'jik), a. [< pleuralgia + -ic.]

Pertaining to or affected with pleuralgia.

pleuralia (plö-rā'li-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of *pleuralis, < Gr. πλευρά, the side: see pleurali, pleural.] In sponges, spicules forming a fur.

F. E. Shulze.

pleurapophysial (plö-rap-ō-fiz'i-al), a. [\(\rho\)pleurapophysis + -al.] Having the morphological character of a pleurapophysis; of the nature of a rib; costal; costiferous.

pleurapophysis (plti-ra-pof'i-sis), n.; pl. pleurapophyses (-sez). [NL., < Gr. πλευρόν, a rib, + ἀπόφυσις, a process: see apophysis.] A lateral process of a vertebra, having the morpholatical characteristic of the process of the cost of the + ἀπόφυσις, a process: see apophymas.] A lateral process of a vertebra, having the morphological character of a rib, or forming a true rib. Such processes in the thoracic region of the spine are commonly highly developed, and movably articulated both with the centra and with the dispophyses of the thoracic vertebre, and they are then ribs in an ordinary sense. They are mostly rudimentary in other parts of the spinal column, but sometimes are very evident, as in the cervical ribs of various vertebrates, including man. In man, in the neck, they bound the vertebrate ordal foramen in front, and produce the tubercles known as anterior on the transverse process. Pleurspophyses are also by some considered to be represented in the lateral mass of the human ascrum. Developed and movably articulated pleurspophyses, forming true ribs, often extend into the sacral as well as cervical region, as in various birds; and in all of this class more or fewer of them bear accessory processes called sactinates. (See cut under expleurs.) In serpents they run in unbroken series from head to tall, and assist in locomotion. (See gastrosteps.) In some reptiles they support a patagium (see cut under dragon); in the cobra they spread the hood. In Owen's nomenclature the term pleurspophysis as restricted to the true bony part of a rib, the gristly part or costal cartilage being called hemapophysis. See cuts under vertebra and sudosteteton.

Pleurarthron (plō-rār'thron), n.; pl. pleurarthra (-thrē). [NL., ⟨Gr. πλευρά, a rib, + ἀμθρον, a joint.] The articulation of a rib. Thomas, Med. Dict.

Med. Diet

Pleurecbolic (plö-rek-bol'ik), a. [(Gr. πλευρά, participated (pio-rea-bot in), a. [Not. macyle, the side, $+i\kappa\beta\alpha\lambda\eta$, a throwing out: see ecbolic.] Eversible or capable of protrusion by a forward movement of the sides of the containing tube, as an invert: correlated with acrembolic, and distinguished when below the fiber of the sides of the containing tube, distinguished from pleurembolic. [Rare.]

It is clear that, if we start from the condition of full eversion of the tube and watch the process of introversion, we shall find that the pleurechoic variety is introverted by the apex of the tube sinking inwards.

Laukastor Enova. Brit., XVI. 662. , Encyc. Brit., XVI. 652.

Pleurembolic (plö-rem-bol'ik), a. [(Gr. πλευρά, the side, + ἐμβολή, a putting into: see embolic.]

Introversible or capable of being withdrawn by a backward movement of the parts into which it sinks, as an evert: correlated with acreebolic, and distinguished from pleureebolic.

It (the pleurecbolic variety of eversion) may be called acrombolic, whilst conversely the acreobolic tubes are pleurembolic.

Lankster, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 652.

pleurenchyma (plö-reng'ki-mä), s. [NL., < Gr. pleurenchyma (piφ-reng'ki-mk), s. [NL., < Gr.
πλευφά, the side, + ἐγχυμα, what is poured in:
see enchymatous, parenchyma.] In bot., the woody tissue of plants, her wood-cell.
pleurenchymatous (plö-reng-kim'a-tus), a. [< pleurenchyma(t-) + -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of pleurenchyma.

plenric (plö'rik) a. [< pleurenthyma.

pleuric (plo'rik), a. [< pleura1 + -ic.] Same pleuric (plö'rik), a. [< pleural + -ic.] Same as pleural!.

pleurisy (plö'ri-si), n. [Formerly also plurisy, partly associated (as in the equiv. ML. plurior, plurius, plethora) with L. plus (gen. pluris), more, as if implying a plothora of blood; < F. pleuresia = Pr. pleuresia = Sp. pleuresia = Pg. pleuris = It. pleurisia, < 1.L. pleurisia, a later form of the reg. L. pleuritis: see pleuritis.] Inflammation of the pleura. It may be acute or chronic, and may or may not be accompanied by effusion. The effusion may be serous, seropurulent, purulent, or hemorrhagic. Also called pleuritis.

The Pleurisie stabs him with desperate foy!

The Pleurisic stabs him with desperate foyl Beneath the ribs, where scalding blood doth boyl. Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Furies. Lost pleasing get start of providence.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 194.

Dry pleurisy, pleurisy without effusion. pleurisy-root (plö'ri-si-röt), n. A plant of the milkwoed family, Asclepias tuberosa: so named

Part of the Inflorescence of Pictursy-ne root and the lower part of the stem. the stagma; ϵ , the fruit; d, a seed.

pleuritic² (plö-rit'ik), a. [< pleurite + -ic.]
1. In arthropods, of or pertaining to a pleurite; pleural, as a segment of a somite.—2. In eniom., specifically, lateral or pleural and abdominal; of or pertaining to a pleurite.

pleuritical (plö-rit'i-kai), a. [< pleuritic1 + pasturated (pip-ri - κφι), a. [\ plouritic1 + -al.] Same as pleuritic1.

Pleuritis (pll-ri'tis), n. [NL., \ L. pleuritis, \ Gr. πλευρίτης, pleuritis (cf. πλευρίτης, on or at the side), \ πλευρά, the side: see ploura1.] Same side), (πλευρα, the side: see ploural.] Same as plourisy.

pleuroblastic (plö-rō-blas'tik), a. [(Gr. πλευρά, the side, + βλαστός, a germ.] In bot., in the Peronoporez, producing vesicular lateral outgrowths which serve as haustoria. De Bary.

Pleurobrachia (plö-rō-brā'ki-ä), π. [Nl., (Gr. πλευρά, the side, + βραχίων, the arm.] A genus of ctenophorans: same as Cydippe, 1.

Menrobranchia! (nlö-rō-brano'ki-ä) » : nl pleurobranchia (plo-rō-brang'ki-ä), n.; pl. pleurobranchia (-ē). [NL., < Gr. n'heupá, the upon an epimeron of any thoracic segment of a crustacean. Some of the thoracic segments, as in the crawfish, may hear on each side four branchie, a coxopoditic podobranchia, anterior and posterior arthrobranchia, and epimeral pleurobranchia.

Pleurobranchia² (plö-rō-brang'ki-¾), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. πλευρά, the side, + βρά χα, gills.] Same as Pleurobranchiala. J. E. Gray, 1821.

pleurobranchial (plö-rō-brang'ki-ҳl), a. [⟨ pleurobranchial (plö-rō-brang'ki-ҳl), a. [⟨ pleurobranchial + -al.] Of or pertaining to a pleurobranchia: as a pleurobranchial process.

pleurobranchia! + -al.] Of or pertaining to a pleurobranchia: as, a pleurobranchiat process.

Pleurobranchiata (plö-rö-brang-ki-ä'(ä), s. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of pleurobranchiatus: see pleurobranchiate.] An order of opisthobranchiate gastropods, whose gills are tufts on the sides under a fold of the mantle, and which have generally a griful shall in the adult as well as the erally a spiral shell in the adult as well as the young. Also Pleurobranchia, Tectibranchiata.

young. Also Pleurobranchia, Techbranchiata, pleurobranchiata (plö-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. [< NL. pleurobranchiatas, ⟨ ir. π'περά, the side, + βράγχα, gills.] 1. Having pleurobranchias, as a crustaceau.—2. Having gills along the sides; specifically, pertaining to the Pleurobranchiata, or having their characters.

Pleurobranchidæ (plö-rö-brang'ki-dě), n. pl. [NL., < Pleurobranchus + -idæ.] A family of notaspidean nudibranchiate gastropods, typifield by the genus Pleurobranchus. They have dis-tinct buccal tentacles forming a veil, branchis on the right side of the body under the border of the mantle, a proboscidiform mouth, and numerous falciform marginal teeth on the radula.

Pleurobranchus (plö-rō-brang'-kus), a. [Nl₂, < (ir. πλειφα, the side, + βμάγχια, gills.] A genus of nudibranchiates, typical of the family Pleurobranchida.

Pleurobranchus membranchus.

Pleurocarpi (plö-rö-kär'pi), n. pl. [NL., \langle Gr. $\pi\lambda\nu\nu\rho_d$, the side, $+\kappa\mu\rho\pi\delta_c$, fruit.] A division of bryaccous mosses in which the fructification is lateral on the stems, having proceeded from the axils of the leaves. Sometimes called Pleurocarna.

pleurocarpons (plö-rō-kār'pus), a. [ζ Gr. πλενρά, the side, + καμπός, fruit.] In bot., having the fructification proceeding laterally from the axils of the leaves, as in some mosses. Sachs.

pleurocele (plö'rō-sōl), n. [⟨ Gr. πλευρά, the side, + κήλη, tumor.] Same as pneumocele.

pleurocentral (plö-rō-sen'tral), a. [⟨ pleurocentrum + -al.] Of or pertaining to a pleurocentrum; hemicentral.

pleurocentrum (plö-rö-sen'trum), n.; pl. plėu-rocentra (-trii). [NL., ζ (ir. πλευρά, the side, + κίντρον, the center.] One of the lateral elements of the centrum of a vertebra; a hemicentrum.

from its medicinal use. Also called butter flywood.

Pleurocera (plö-ros'e-rii), n. [NL., (Gr. πλευρά, the side, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of American fresh-water univalves, typical of the family + 4te².] 1. In arthropods, a pleural selerite; a lateral piece or segment of a somitic ring or somite, between the tergite and the stornite.—

2. In a restricted sense, the lateral or pleural part of an abdominal segment of an insect.

pleuritic¹ (plö-rit'ik), a. [⟨ L. pleuriticus, ⟨ Gr. πλευρά, the side, + L. cerebrun, the brain: see cerebral.] Connecting the side of the body with the head: specifically, in mollusks and some other invertebrates, noting a nervous cord connecting a cerebral with a pleural ganglion.

Pleurocera + -idæ.] A family of tenioglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Pleurocera. It comprises a great number of species, mostly occurring in the fresh-waters of the United States, referred by the old writers to the melanians. They are distinguished, however, by their unfringed mantle, want of a distinct male organ, and oviparity. Also called Ceriphanidæ and Strepomatidæ.

pleurocœle (plő'rō-sēl), n. [< Gr. πλευρά, the side, + κοίλου, a hollow, neut. of κοίλος, hollow.]
One of two lateral spaces of the posterior part of the splanchnocade of a brachiopod.

I propose to give the name pleuroceles to these spaces, simply from their position as side chambers.

Davidson, Trans. Linn. Soc., XIV. Hi. 210.

pleurocolic (plö-rō-kol'ik), α. [< Gr. πλευρόν, pleurocollesis (plö'rō-ko-lō'sis), n. [NL., ζ (gr. π'ευρά, the side, + κάλλησε, a gluing, ζ κυ'λῶν, glue, ζ κάλλα, glue.] Adhesion of the plaura.

Pleuroconchæt (plö-rö-kong'kē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨Gr. πλευρά, the side, + κάγχη, a mussel, shell.]

A suborder of inequivalve Conchéfera, comprising the families Aviculide, Pectinide, Spondy-lide, Ostreide, and Chamide. Pleurodeles (plö-rod'e-lēz), n. [NL.] A genus of tailed amphibians, typical of the family Plaurodelidæ.

Plenrodelids (piö-rō-del'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Pleurodeles + -ids.] A family of gradient or tailed amphibians, typified by the genus Pleurodeles. They have palatine teeth in two longitudinal series diverging behind, inserted on the inner margin of two palatine processes, which are much prolonged posteriorly; the parasphenoid toothless; and a postfrontal arch, sometimes ligamentous Pleurodira (pli-rō-di'r\(\frac{1}{2}\)), n. pl. [NL.: see Pleurodires.] A superfamily of tortoises with the neck bending in a horizontal plane, and pelvis ankylosed to carapace and plastron. It includes the recent families Sternothæridæ, Podocumidide, Chelydide, and several extinct domensidide, Chelydidæ, and several extinct ones. Chelodines is a synonym.

pleurodiran (plö-rō-di'ran), a. Same as pleurodirous. Amer. Nat., XXII. 36.

Pleurodires (plō-rō-di'rēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. πλευρά, the side, + δευρή, the neck.] In Gray's classification, a suborder of tortoises whose necks bend sidewise; the pleurodirous tortoises: same as Pleurodira. See cut under Cheludidæ. Chelydida.

pleurodirous (plö-rō-dī'rus), a. [⟨Gr. πλευρά, the side, + δευρά, the neck.] In Chelonia, bending the neck sidewise: noting those tortoises, as the matamata, which thus fold the head and neck in the shell: opposed to cryptodirous. See out under Chelodide. pleurodirous (plö-ro-dī'rus), a. out under Chelydidie.

II. n. A pleurodont lizard; a member of the Pleurodontes.

Pleurodontes (plö-rö-don'tēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of "pleurodus (plourodont-): see pleurodont.] group of pleurodont lizards, comprising such as the American iguanoids. J. Wagter, 1830. pleurodynia (plö-rō-din'i-μ), π. [NL., ζ Gr. πλευμά, the side, + bδίνη, pain.] In pathol., pain in the muscles of the chest.

pleuro-esophageus (plö-rō-ō-sō-fā' jō-us), n.
[NL., < (ir. πλευμά, the side, + ωπόφαγος, esophagus.] A band of smooth muscle-fibers connectgus.] A band of smooth muscle-fibers connecting the left pleura behind with the esophagus.

pleurogenic (plö-rō-jen'ik), a. [⟨Gr. πλευμά, the side, + -)-rνψ, produced: see -genous.] Originating from the pleura: as, pleurogenic phthisis.

pleurogynous (plö-roj'i-nus), a. [ζ Gr. πλευρά,
the side, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. pistil).]

In bot., having a glandular or tubercular elevation rising close to and parallel with the ovary.

pleurogyrate (plö-rō-ji rāt), a. [ζ Gr. πλινρά, the side, + 1. gyraius, pp. of gyrare, turn: see gyrate.] In bot., having the ring on the thoca (of ferns) placed laterally.

pleurogyratous (plö-rō-ji'rā-tus), a. [< pleuro-gyrate + -ous.] Same as pleurogyrate.

pleurohepatitis (plö-rō-hep-g-ti'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. πλευρά, the side, + ἡπαρ (ἡπατ-), liver, + -tits. Gf. hepatitis.] Inflammation of the liver and adjugant place.

pleuroid (plö'roid), n. [(Gr. πλευρόν, a rib, + είδος, form. Cf. Gr. πλευροειδώς, adv., after the manner of ribs.] One of the pair of distinct pleural elements which compose the pleural pietral elements which compose the pietral arch of a vertebra; a pleurapophysis: correlated with neuroid. G. Bam, Amer. Nat., XXI. 945.

pleurolepidal (plö-rō-lep'i-dal), a. [< NL. Pietrolepis (-lepid-) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the Pictrolepididæ; having oblique rows of ribbod rhomboid scales interlocking. Rach scale has upon its inner anterior margin a thick, solid, bony rib extending upward, and sliced off obliquely below, thus forming splices with the inverse parts of the upper and lower scales.

Pleurolepididæ (plö'rō-le-pid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Pleurolepis (-lepid-) + -idæ.] A family of fossil pycnodont fishes, typified by the genus Pleurolepis. By some they are united with the Dapactida. The vertebral column was homocercal, the fins had fulers, and the body was not very high. They flourished in the Liassic. Also Pleurolepida.

Pleurolepis (plö-rol'e-pis), n. [NL., < Gr. πλευρά, the side, + λεπίς, a scale.] The typical genus of the Pleurolepidida, The typical genus of scales, whence the name. Agassiz.

cal genus of the Picurolephadae, having fidlike rows of scales, whence the name. Agassiz.

Pleuroleura (plö-rō-lū'rā), n. [NL., (Gr. πλευρά, the side, + λευράς, smooth, level.] A genus of nudibranchiates, typical of the family Pleuroleuridæ. Also called Dermatbranchus.

leuridæ. Also called Dermatorancaus.

Pleuroleuridæ (plö-rō-lū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., <
Pleuroleura + -idæ.] A family of inferobranchiate nudibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Plouroleura (or Dermatoranchus). They are destitute of specialised branchiss, and respiration is effected by the skin. Also called Dermatoran-pleuromelus (plö-rom'e-lus), n.; pl. pleuromeli (-ii). [NL.,< (ir. $\pi\lambda\epsilon\nu\rho\dot{a}$, the side, + $\mu\dot{\epsilon}\lambda\rho_{c}$, a limb.] In teratol., a monster with supernumerary limbs attached to the lateral regions of the trunk.

Pleuromonadidæ (plö'rō-mō-nad'i-dē), n. pl. [Nl., < Pleuromonus (-monad-) + -idæ.] A family of pantostomatous flagellate Infusoria, typified by the genus Pleuromonas. These animalcules are free-awimming, and naked or illoricate, and have a single lateral or dextral flagellum and no distinct have a single lateral of deliver ingenium site to consider oral aperture.

Pleuromonas (plö-rom'ō-nas), n. [NL., < Gr. πλευρά, the side, + NL. Monas, < Gr. μονάς (μοναδ-), a unit: see monad.] The typical genus of Pleuromonadidæ. P. jaculaus is an example.

the side of the thorax: chiefly used of invertebrates. Specifically—(a) In Crustacea, a lateral pleco or part of any somite below the tergum and above the insection of the legs; an opimeron. (b) In Tribbita, one of the flattened lateral sections of a thoracic or pygidial somite, lying on each side of the axis or tergum. See cut under Tribbita. (c) In enterm., the lateral section of the thorax; the pleural part of any one of the three thoracic somites. There are consequently three pleura on each side, called from their position the propleuron, mesopheuron, and metapleuron, according to their respective seats on the prothorax, mesothorax, and metathorax.

Pleuronectes (plö-rō-nek'tēz), n. [NL (Artedi, Linneus), (Gr. πλευρά, the side, + νήκτης, a swimmer.] A genus of flatfishes, giving name to the family Pleuronectide, formerly conterminous with the family, later variously conforminous with the family, later variously restricted. By most recent writers the name has been limited to the group typified by the common plates, P. platess, sometimes to the few species much like this type, sometimes extended to a larger assomblage. By others it has been used for the turbots, otherwise called Bohau and Pasta. By others still it has been employed for the genus otherwise called Honglossus. In a common European acceptation it includes flounders of northern seas, having the eyes and the color on the right side, the colored side of each jaw usually toothless, the bind side with clow-set teeth in one (rarely two) series, the body ovate or elliptical, the small scales of enoid or cycloid, the lateral line nearly straight or more or less arched anteriorly, and the small gill-rakers widely set. About 12 species of Pleuronectes in this sense are found in North America, a majority of them on the Pacific coast, as P. (Platichthys) stellatus, the California flounder, one of the largest and most important. P. (Limands) ferrupineus is the sand-dab of the Atlantic coast. P. (Pseudopleuronectes) americanus is the mud-dab or winter flounder, common on this coast from New York northward. northward.

pleuronectid (plö-rō-nek'tid), n. and a. I. n. A flatfish; any member of the Pleuronectidæ; a pleuronectoid.

pleuronectoid.

It. a. Of or pertaining to the Pleuronectidæ.

Pleuronectidæ (plö-rō-nek'ti-dē), n. pl. [Nl., < Pleuronectes + -idæ.] A family of teleocephalous fishes, of the suborder Heterosomata, or flatfishes, or the Anacanthini pleuronectoidei of Günther, comprising the flatfishes or flounders.

Lepidopsetta bilineata, of California, one of the Pleuri

In the widest sense, it includes all the representatives of the suborder. The head is unsymmetrical, with both eyes on one side; one surface is colored, the other coloriess; and the dorsal and anal fine are long and soft. The genera are about 40 in number, with 400 species, mostly carnivorous, inhabiting sandy bottoms of all seas, sometimes ascending rivers, and including such important food-fishes as the halibut, turbot, plaice, and sole. With more restricted limits, it embraces those which have the general physiognomy of the plaice or halibut, distinctly outlined preopercie and other bones, little twisted mouth, generally subscute smout, and nostrils little dissimilar on two sides. It thus excludes the true soles and like fishes (see Soleidar). See also cuts under halibut, plaice, founder, Parallehthys, sole, and turbot. Also Pleuronectoid, a. and n. II. n. A member of the Pleuronectoidei; a Pleuronectoidei (plö'rō-nek-toi'dō-ī), n. pl. [NL.: see pleuronectoid.] Same as Pleuronectidæ.

pleuropathia (plö-rō-path'i-ij), π. [NI.., < Gr. πλευρά, the side, + πάθος, suffering.] Disease of the pleura pleuropedal (plō-rō-ped'al), a. [ζ Gr. πλευρά, the side, + L. pes (ped-) = E. foot.] Connecting the side of the body with the foot: specifically said of a nervous cord which connects a pleural with a pedal ganglion, as in mollusks. Also pedopleural.

pleuropericarditis (plö-rō-per'i-kär-dī'tis), n. [NL., ζ Gr. πλειρά, the side, + NL. pericardium, q. v., + -itis.] Inflammation of the pleura and the pericardium.

pleuroperipneumony (plö-rō-per-ip-nū'mō-ni), cumonia

Same as pleurope pleuroperitoneal, pleuroperitoneal (plö-rō-per'i-tō-nō'al), a. [< pleuroperitonean + -al.] In zoöl. and anat., of or relating to the pleura and the peritoneum, or the general body-cavity or periviseeral cavity of a vertebrate animal when it is not divided by a partition (diaphragm) into a pleural or thoracic and a periphragm) into a pleural or thoracte and a pertoneal or abdominal cavity. It is formed in the early embryo by the splitting of the lamines ventrales into inner or splanchnopleural and outer or somatopleural layers, and the union of the latter layers of right and left sides in the ventral midline of the body.

pleuroperitoneum, pleuroperitoneum (plőröper"i-tö-ně'um), n. [NL., < (ir. πλευρά, the side, + περιτύνων, peritoneum: see peritoneum.]

A specific contagious disease, peculiar to cattle, affecting the lungs and the pleura, supposed to be caused by some form of micro-organism. It was recognized as far back as the eighteenth century, and now occurs in all the countries of western Europe, in the United States, in southern Africa, and in Australia. The losses which it causes are frequently enormous. The disease first appears in the interlobular tissue of the lungs, whence it invades the pleura and the lung-tissue proper. The latter becomes solidified, and dark-red in color, which varies in later stages. The interlobular tissue becomes thickened into broad yellowiah or grayish bands, which give the cut aurface of the lungs a peculiar marbled appearance. The disease may be limited to a single lobe or involve one entire lung. A lung becomes very heavy, weighing in some cases over fifty pounds. The disease appears after a period of incubation of from three to six weeks with a feeble cough, which grows more troublesome from week to week. There is alight fever, associated with partial cessation of runimation and milk-secretion. The back is srched and the head is stretched out horizontally during fits of coughing. After a period of from two to six weeks the animal may recover, or the disease may enter a second or acute stage, in which all the symptoms mentioned become greatly aggravated.

cultural implement, drawn by animals or moved by steam-power, used to cut the ground and turn it up so as to prepare it for the reception of by steam-power, used to cut the ground and turns it up so as to prepare it for the reception of seeds. The soil is cut to a depth of several inches, raised up, and turned over by the progress of the plow, the object being to expose a new surface to the air and, by palverising and loosening the soil, to fit it for the reception of seed and the vigorous growth of crops. The plow, in various forms, is also much used for other purposes. In its modern form, the common agricultural plow essentially consists of a plow-beam provided with a decise for attachment of draft-animals; handles, connected with each other and cross-braced by the remads; a mold-board, usually of cast-iron; a ploushare, usually of steel, or steel-pointed, and holted to the mold-board; a land-side, usually of cast-iron, attached to the mold-board; a land-side, usually of cast-iron, attached to the mold-board; and a standard or shell, projecting upward from and usually integral with the mold-board, and connecting the latter with the beam. The rear end of the beam is attached to the land-side handle, one handle being attached to the rear part of the land-side and the other to the rear part of the mold-board. Often a wheel is adjustably attached to the beam near the clevis, for gaging the depth of the furrow.

Same as double plow (b).—Seeding-plow, a plow with a box for holding and scattering seed in the path of the furrow.—Shim-colter plow, a plow having in advance of the mold-board of the principal plow a small inclined share or scraper, which outs off weeds and scrapes them, and sometimes apread manure, into the turrow previously plowed, where the main plow covers them.—Shim-plow, a plow with a reversible mold-board, which can be turned to throw the furrow downhill in plowing in opposite directions along the side or slope of a hill. Also called &illade-plow and turn-wover plow.—Ehovel-plow, a plow with a reversible mold-board, which can be turned to throw the furrow downhill in plowing in opposite directions along the side or slope of a hill. Also called &illade-plow and turn-wover plow.—Ehovel-plow, a plow with a triangular share, but having no mold-board. It is used for cultivating growing crops. The double shovel-plow has a very broad triangular share attached to two standards.—Ekeleton-plow, a plow in which the parts bearing against the soil are made in skeleton form, to lesson friction. E. H. Naghk.—Steam-plow, a heavy plow or gang of plows driven adjustable devices for regulating the depth of furrows, and by steam-power. Steam-plows, operating on various principles, are in use in farming on a large scale. Some are driven by a single stationary engine, which winds an endless rope (generally of wire) passing over pulleys attached to an apparatus called the sackor, fixed at the opposite headland, and round a drum connected with the engine itself. Others are driven by two engines, one at each headland, thus superseding the anchor. As steam-plowing apparatus are usually beyond both the means and the requirements of any but the largest farmers, companies have been formed at various places for hiring them cat. Locomotive engines drawing gangs of plows have been tried, but compact the soil so injuriously that their use has been practically abandoned.—Straddle-plow, a plow with two triangular parallel shares set a little apart, used for running on each side of a row of dropped corn for covering the seed. B. H. Knight.—Subsoilplow, a plow with a long standard and a share, but having no mold-board. Following the ordinary furrow, while itself turning no furrow.—Sulky-plow, a plow attached to an axie with two wheels, the axie carrying a seat for the plowman and mechanism for adjusting and guiding the plow. E. H. Knight.—The Plow, the prominent seven stars in the constellation of the Great Bear; Charles's Wain.—To hold the plow. See hold!.—To put one's hand to the plow, figuratively, to begin a task; commence an undertaking.—Turn-wrest plow. Same as side-kill plow.—Wheel-plow. (a) A plow in which the depths of furrows are gaged by a wheel or wheels attached to the plow and running upon the surface of the land. (b) A plow having a wheel in the space between the land-side and the mold-board, reducing the friction of the plow by hearing the weight. E. H. Knight. Stame as plug-rod, 1.—Outting plug. in a chronographic apparatus for registering velocities of projectiles from one position in the bore of a gun to another, one of a series of pluga inserted into holes drilled radially in the gun-barrel from its exterior into the bore. The plug is connected with a looped electric conducting wire of a primary circuit, and at its inner end is a small kulfo plyoted to the body of the plug in such manner that it slightly projects into the bore of the gun, and so arranged that, when forced radially outward by the passage of the projectile over it, it cuts the loop of the wire, and breaks the primary circuit. This induces a brief current in the secondary coll, which has one of its terminals arranged at the edge of one of a series of rapidly, uniformly, and synchronously rotating thin disks of equal disancter attached to a common shaft. The edges of the disks are coated with lampblack. The induced current of the secondary coll produces a spark at the terminal, which burns off a small dot in the peripheral coating. A number of the outting plugs are inserted at uniform intervals in the gun. Each is serially related to one of the disks, in the order of succession from breach to muszle of the gun; and when the gun is fired it records the instant the shot passes it on the edge of its related disk. From the angular distance between these records, the known diameter and rotating speed of the disks, the time occupied by the shot in moving from plug to plug is readily calculated; and it is asserted that intervals of time as small as one millionth of a second can be measured. The data thus obtained are of great value in the investigation of the action of explosives.—Pugg and feathers, a fait from wedge (the plug) used in connection with two semi-oylindrical pieces of by hard work. A fruit of any of the trees called plans (see defs. 2 and 3); specifically, the fruit of a tree of the genus Pranus, distinguished from the peach and apricot by its smooth surface, smaller size, and unwrinkled stone, and from the cherry by the bloom on its surface and commonly larger size. Plums are of use chief-ly as a dessert fruit (the green gage being esteemed the best of all varieties), and as a dried fruit in the form of prunes. (See prace). Locally a liquor is manufactured from them, and sometimes an oil is expressed from the arn.

2. One of several small trees of the genus Pranus, forming the section Pranus proper, The numerous varieties of the common garden-plum are often classed as P. domestica; but all these, together with the bullace-plum, known as P. Institia (see bullace), are believed to be derived ultimately from P. spinosa (P. common, b), the blackthorn or slow of Europe and temperate Asia, in fix truly wild state a much branched shrub, the branches often ending in a stout thorn. Plum wood is useful in cabinet-work and turnery. The plum is chiefly cultivated in France (in the valley of the Loire), in dermany, and in Bosnia, Servia, and Croatia. In America the plum suffers greatly from the ravages of the curcuito. (See plum-curcuito.) The Japanese plum, P. Japonica, though not insect-proof, is a valued acquisition in California and the southern United States. For matice species, see beach-plum, cherry-plum, and add plum, below.

pneograph (ne ō-grat), n. [Irreg. < Gr. πνείν, breathe, + γράφων, write.] An instrument invented by Dr. Mortimer Granville for testing and indicating the duration, force, and continuity of expiration in diverse conditions of the lungs. It consists of a delicately suspended and counterpoised semi-disk of tale, which is moved by the breath when held in front of the mouth. The disk carries a needle, which makes a tracing on smoked paper caused to move uniformly in relation with the needle. The tracings indicate by their undulations the character of the expiratory movement, from which the condition of the lungs may be inferred.

pneuma (nū'mii), n. [NI., ⟨Gr. πνετμα, breath, ⟨πνετμ, blow, breathe. Cf. neume, neuma.] 1.

Breath; spirit; soul.—2. A breathing. In early church music: (a) A form of ligature at the end of cortain plain-chant melodies, resembling the periclesis, but differing from it in being sung to an unmeaning syllable having no connection with the text. Its use can be traced with certainty to the fourth century, and it is still employed in the services of the Roman Catholic Church, especially at high mass. (b) Same as neume, 2.

pneumarthrosis (nū-mār-thrō'sis), n. [NI., ⟨ Gr. πνεύμα, air, + ἀμθμωσις, a jointing: see arthrosis.] The presence of air in the cavity of a joint.

(b) Of or pertaining to the respiratory system of any animal. Pneumatic action, in organ-building, an action in which the keys, ston-knobs, or podals merely make connections whereby the desired motions may be pneumatically effected. The pneumatic principle involved is either that of a small bellows which is inflated or emptical by the key or coupler, or that of a tube with pistons or valves at the ends which work sympathetically. Pneumatic bellows, coupler, etc. Nee pneumatic action, above. Pneumatic calinet, in med., an air-tight cabinct in which a patient is placed, so that the atmospheric pressure on the surface of the body may be increased or diminished. Pneumatic calson. Sec calson, 3(c). Pneumatic car, clock, conductor, drill. See the nouns. Pneumatic despatch, the transmission of articles from one pointto another by air-pressure through a tube specially prepared for the purpose. Practically this is limited to the sending of small articles, as letters, telegraphic despatches, etc., for short distances, as between different stations in a large city. They are inclosed in a suitable box, which is propelled by compressed air through a tube from 2 to 3 inches in diameter; the roturn takes place by the atmospheric pressure, the air in the tube being exhausted at the first station. Pneumatic-despatch tube, a tube traversed by a car or carrier which receives and delivers letters or parcels at stations along a route. Motion is caused by pressure of air, which is either forced into the tube from behind the car or exhausted in front of it, or both simultaneously. Special devices have been contrived for perfecting the construction of the Brisbane carrier is a hollow ball which rolls along the interior of the pneumatic tube. (a) A tube open at the lower or ponetrating end, and closed from the air at the top, but communicating with a receiver from which air is exhausted. The pressure of the air acts to force the pile downward and at the same time the silt within it is pressed upward and discharged into the receiver. (b) A caisson within which compressed air excludes the water, permitting necessary operations to be carried on inside it.—Pneumatic spring, tube, etc. See the nouns.—Pneumatic trough, a form of trough used by the physicist or chemist in experiments with gasses. By its use the gas can be collected in a beil-jar or other receptacle over a surface of water or mercury.

Pneumatomachian (nū'ma-tō-mā'ki-an), n. and a. [ζ (ir. πνευματομάχος, hostile to the Holy Spirit, ζ πνευμα(τ-), spirit, + μάχεσθα, quarrel.] I. n. An adversary of the Holy Chost; one who denies the existence, personality, or godhes and to restly or group of the Holy Spirit; specifically out of a section restly or group or successive specifically. cally, one of a sect or party, or group or suc-cession of parties and sects, in the fourth cencession of parties and seems, in the fourth century holding such doctrines. The Preumatomachians in general taught that the Holy Ghost is a creature, a ministering spirit. Some combined this view with the Arian view that God the Son is a creature, and a few taught the extreme doctrine that the Spirit is the creature of a creature (the Son). Most of them, however, accepted the Homolousian doctrine of the person of the Son, and them, were known as Macadonians or Macadonians. cepted the Honolousian doctrine of the person of the Son, and these were known as Macedonians or Marathonians, and also as Semi-Arians—the Semi-Arians having as a whole adopted these views. The views of the Pneumatomachians were developed out of Arianian, after the Nicene Council (a. p. 225), and first showed themselves distinctly about 388. The heresy declined rapidly after the Constantinopolitan Council of 381.

In fruit this blade usually becomes fieshy, forming a pulpy covering to the hard shell-like seed, which contains a thin embryo with two seed-leaves only, in fieshy albumen. The staminate flowers are solitary or in clusters of from two to five, or in long catkins, the stamens forming a long dense column covered with sessile two-celled authors in spiral rows. There are from 40 to 0 species, forming much the largest coniferous genus except Finus. They are chiefly natives of the southern humisphere beyond the tropics, and also frequent in montane and eastern tropical Asia. They are evergreen trees, with much diversity in foliage: the leaves are either scattered, opposite, two-ranked, or crowded; scale-like, linear, or broad; and vehices or with many fine parallel voins. The fruit is a globular or evoid drupe or nut, 14 inches or branches, the inative plum or damson of New Bouth Wales, also called Mascarra pine and white pine. Several other species are known as fir or pine among the colonists of New Zealand, Australia, and Cape Colony. Compare frand pinel, and for individual species see kniktaen, matai, and miru. risk of intellectual emancipation.

14. A small unit of measurement. (a) A linear unit, the tenth part of a geometrical line, the twelfth part of a French line. (b) In typegt, a type-founding unit of measure; in the United States about one seventy-second of an inch. It regulates the bodies and defines numerically different sizes of types. The body of pica, for instance, is 12 points in size, and the new designation for pica is 12 point. The French (bldiet) point is larger. Twelve points French are nearly equal to thirteen points American. The point system was introduced in 1737 by Fournier the younger, a type-founder of Paris. As made by him, this point was not a regular fraction of any legally prescribed measure. François-Ambroise Didot readjusted this point as a fraction of the standard royal foot, in which form it was gradually accepted by the printing-trades of France and Germany. The American point was adopted by the United States Type-Founders' Association in 1883, and made of smaller size, to prevent a too marked disturbance of the sizes then in regular use. The old names of types and their relation to each other are shown by the number of points assigned to each size in the following table:

15. A unit of fluctuation of price per share or other standard of reference on the exchanges. other standard of reference on the exchanges, etc. In stock transactions in the United States a point is $1 (or in Great Britain £1); in coffice and cotton it is the hundredth part of a cent, and in oil, grain, pork, etc., one cent: as, Krie preferred has declined five points; coffee has gone up 200 points.

17. In piquet, the number of cards in the longest suit of a hand: as, what is your point? Six.—

18. In luce-making, needle-point lace: as, Alen-18. In lace-making, needle-point lace: as, Alencon point; Dresden point; a collar of point. See cut under lace. Used in the plural, the term denotes lace, especially fine lace in general: as, a christening-robe trimmed with French points; especially so used in the eighteenth century, in such plurases as "he is well in points"—that is, well supplied with lace. Point is also used freely in English in connection with the decorative arts (as a tapostry of Beauvais point), referring to some peculiar kind of work, and is even applied to bobbin-lace and the like. It also denotes vaguely a pattern or a feature of a pattern in works of embroidery and the like, usually in connection with the stitch or the peculiar method of work which produces it. Thus, dentelle, point d'Angleterre, means literally lace, English style of work, but the plurase English point is more often used for it, causing great confusion with the proper sense of needle-point lace. See lace.

We shall all he' bride-laces

We shall all ha' bride-laces sints. B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, i. 2. Or points.

19. A lace with tags at the end.
Such laces, about eight inches long, consisting often of three differently colored strands of yarn twisted together and having their ends wrapped with irou, were used in the middle ages to fasten the clothes together, but gave place to buttons in the seventeenth century. They were also made of silk or leather. They or their tags were much used as small stakes in gaming, as forfeits, counters, and gratuities—uses explaining many allusions in old writers, especially the figurative use of the word for a small value, or a thing of small value.

ity of figures or charges. (b) The middle part of either the chief or the base as distinguished from the dexter and sinister cantons. (c) A bearing which occupies the base of the esbearing which occupies the base of the escutcheon. It is usually considered as a pile reversed—that is, rising from the base and reaching to the upper edge of the escutcheon; but it is very often of less height, reaching only to the fosse-point or to the nombril, and sometimes is merely the base itself bounded by a horisontal line separating it from the rest of the field. Plain point is especially treated in the way last mentioned. The bearing is very rare in English armory, and hence some writers treat it as synonymous with base, and others as synonymous with base, and others as aynonymous with base, and conterns as youngmous with discount of the sample are straight. (d) A division of the field barwise: thus, three points gules, argent, and azure, means that the field is divided into three horizontal stripes, of which the uppermost is red, the middle one silver, etc.—23†. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Ist., 11. 352. of an ambiguous word. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., 11, 352. Pointed arch, an arch bounded by two arcs each less than 90. The arch of this form is characteristic of Rurapean modieval architecture from the middle of the twelfth century, though examples of its use occur earlier. Its logical and consistent use was devised and perfected in France. The pointed arch of much Oriental architecture is an independent development, which never led to the logical conclusions and constructive methods of the French pointed architecture. See Pointed siple, below.

Gothic architecture: see Poince upc, nelow.

Gothic architecture differs from Romanesque far more fundamentally than by the use of poinced arches in place of round arches, or by the substitution of one decorative system for another.

Pointed ashler, Seeashler, S.—Pointed box, in mining, a box in the form of an inverted pyramid, forming one of a series of three or four, and used for dressing ore according to the method devised by Von Rittinger. Also called a V-val, and frequently by the German name Sphizkusten (that is, 'point-box').—Pointed cross, in her., a cross having every one of its four arms pointed shruptly, or with a blunt point, differing from the cross fitche of all four, which is like a four-pointed star.—Pointed style, in arch., a general phrase under which are included all the different varieties of advanced medieval architecture, generally called Gothic, from the common application of the pointed arch and vault in the twelfth century until the general diffusion of Renaissance architecture toward the beginning of the sixteenth century. This style, as fully developed by the middle of the thirteenth century, exhibits great flexibility and adaptability to all purposes, and is thoroughly in accord with the conditions imposed upon the architect by northern climates, which demand, among other things, spacious and well-lighted interiors for public meetings, and high-pitched roofs which can shed rain rapidly and upon which heavy masses of snow cannot obvious characteristics of this style, they are in fact mercely necessary details of it. It is fundamentally a system of construction in stone in which a skeleton framework of rihs and props forms the essential organic part of the building. All the weights and strains are collected in a relatively small number of points, where the loads are supported by vertical props or piers, while the lateral pressures are counterbalanced by buttresses and flying-buttresses. Upon the ribs rest shells of masonry constituting the vanits or ceiling, and between those of the props which fall in the exterior boundary of the building thin inclosing walls are carried up, which walls may be, and in the most perfect examples often are, almost entirely done away with, giving place to light-transmitting screens of colored glass supported by a slender secondary framework of stone and metal. The use of the pointed arch and vanit has the advantage over that of the earlier semicircular forms that the pressures outward are less strong and more easily counteracted; and good examples of the style are as carefully studied, and founded upon principles as scientific and proportions as subtle, as the best threek work. See medicail architecture, under medicail, fran outline of the history of the style, and Decorated, Plansboyant, Perpendicular, and Tudor for the characteristics of some of its varieties. See also sarly English architecture, under early.

Specifically—(a) One of the hands of a clock or watch; the index-hand of a circular barometer, anomometer, or the like. (b) A long tapering stick used by teachers or lecturers in pointing out places on a map, or words, figures, thagrams, etc., on a blackboard. (c) One of a breed of sporting-dogs. A pointer is a modified hound, of medium size, differing from the setter in being close-haired. When game is scented the pointer stands stiffly, with the muzzle raised and stretched toward the game, the tail straight out behind, and usually one fore foot raised. Most setters are now trained to this same action, instead of to drop before game as formerly. Pointers are usually liver-colored, or liver and white, but many retain the tan marks of the foxhound, and some are black. They are used chiefly for hunting birds, and make excellent retrievers.

The pointer is known to have come originally from Spain.

—3. A machine or, more properly, an apparatus used by sculptors in the production of stone or marble copies of clay models, to locate accurately any point in the copy of the modeled rately any point in the copy of the modeled figure. It consists of a round standard a, and three round cross-bars b, a, d, made adjustable by means of the sliding-crosses and set-screws k, l, m. On b are two adjustable stocks i, j, with steel points, and at k is a third point rigidly stached to d. In the clay model, or more usually, in a plaster cast of t, are fixed small metal socket plates s, t, r, each with a small countersink or socket. To these three points the standard is adjusted, the axis of the standard being, when applied to s, t, r, always coincident with the intersection of two fixed planes. To the stone to be cut three socket-plates s, t, t, r are fixed in such positions that the points will exactly fit their countersinks. The cross-bar e being adjustable vertically on the standard, its axis may be made to coincide with any third plane of projection cutting at right angles the two fixed vertical planes intersecting in the axis of the standard. On e is another cross-bar e, with an adjustable universal-motion sliding-cross s, and to e is also attached at p a scoket holding a bar f that also carries at q a friction-spring holder for the pointer g, the sliding rately any point in the copy of the modeled tail in the model. It is then applied to the stone, and if it does not simultaneously touch the bottoms of all the suckets when the point of g touches the stone, the latter is cut carefully away till a,t, and r all bed home in their suckets and the point of g just touches the bottom of the cut. Other points in the surface are located similarly as guides for the cutting, and intermediate points are located as the cutting proceeds. The instrument is also used to test the accuracy of the work as it progresses, and remarkable fidelity in the copy is attainable by its use.
